FOREWORD

The reports on individual country human rights practices contained herein were prepared by the Department of State in accordance with sections 116(d) and 502B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended. They also fulfill the legislative requirement of section 31 of the Bretton Woods Agreement Act.

Because there is interest in human rights practices of all nations—those that receive U.S. foreign assistance and those that do not—these reports are being printed to assist Members of Congress in considering legislation in the area of foreign assistance.

RICHARD G. LUGAR,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Relations,
DANTE B. FASCELL,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Affairs.

COUNTRY REPORTS ON HUMAN RIGHTS PRACTICES

INTRODUCTION

1984 Human Rights Report

This report is submitted to the Congress by the Department of State in compliance with Sections 116(d)(1) and 502B(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act 1961, as amended.* The legislation requires reports on all countries which receive aid from the United States, and all countries which are members of the United Nations. In the belief that the information would be useful to the Congress and other readers, we have included as well reports on countries such as Switzerland which are not technically covered in the Congressional requirement. This year there are 164 separate reports, including for the first time one on Brunei, which became independent at the beginning of 1984.

Conditions in most countries are described up to the end of 1984; for a few countries, significant developments occurring during the first weeks of 1985 also are included. A list of twelve international human rights covenants and agreements is included as an Appendix to this report, as well as a sketch of United States human rights policy and a discussion of democracy and human rights, which is excerpted from the Introduction to the 1983 Country Reports.

*Section 116(d)(1) provides as follows:

"The Secretary of State shall transmit to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, by January 31 of each year, a full and complete report regarding --

"(1) the status of internationally recognized human rights, within the meaning of subsection (a) --

(A) in countries that received assistance under this part, and

(B) in all other foreign countries which are members of the United Nations and which are not otherwise the subject of a human rights report under this Act."

Section 503(B)(b) provides as follows:

"The Secretary of State shall transmit to Congress, as part of the presentation materials for security assistance programs proposed for each fiscal year, a full and complete report, prepared with the assistance of the Assistant Secretary for Human Rights and Humanitarian Affairs, with respect to practices regarding the observance of and respect for internationally recognized human rights in each country proposed as a recipient of security assistance."

The format for the reports follows that of last year, which proved generally satisfactory as a framework for addressing the human rights issues of greatest concern to the United States Government. Each report begins with an introduction which provides the political and economic background of the country, describes how the country is governed, and discusses the general trend of human rights in 1984. The report then discusses three broad categories of human rights, in three sections corresponding to the categories:

-- first, the right to be free from governmental violations of the integrity of the person--violations such as killings; torture; cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment; arbitrary arrest or imprisonment; denial of fair public trial; and invasion of privacy.

-- second, the right to enjoy civil rights, without discrimination based on race or sex, including freedom of speech, press, assembly, and religion, and the right to travel freely within and outside one's own country.

-- third, political rights, or the right of citizens to change their government.

A fourth section in the discussion of human rights in each country describes the government's attitude toward outside investigation of internal human rights conditions. A final section in each report discusses general economic and social conditions in the country.* Each report is then followed by statistical tables, where relevant, listing the amounts of United States bilateral assistance and multilateral development assistance for fiscal years 1982, 1983, and 1984 (absence of such a table means that the country received no such assistance for those years).

The only change in terminology from the 1983 report is in the heading "political killing," under which we describe killing that is illegal or politically motivated or government inspired. Although the term used for 1983, "unlawful or arbitrary deprivation of life," was based on the corresponding category in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, many readers felt that it was not an apt description of the human rights abuse concerned. While "political killing" may in turn imply a narrowed definition, the abuses discussed in this category continue to include both politically motivated killings by governments or opposition forces and arbitrary killings committed or instigated by them as a conscious exercise of political power.

*It should be noted that statistical data on economic and social conditions in the final section of each country report are drawn from World Bank figures, which we believe to be the most reliable available. For many countries the Bank data may be two or more years old, but we have used them as the best single, reasonably reliable set of data compiled under consistent methods for all countries. Only when it is clear that the data are significantly out-of-date or that a particular estimate is seriously questionable, have we used data from other sources.

Within the established format, the 1984 report expands coverage in certain categories in order to provide Congress, government agencies, and other users with additional information relevant to their needs. The practice of incommunicado detention, often a symptom that torture is condoned, is specifically addressed, where applicable, in Section 1d, "Arbitrary Arrest, Detention or Exile." The right of workers to organize independent labor unions and to bargain collectively is given increased attention in Section 2b, "Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association," as it constitutes a particularly important exercise of this right and is usually a good indicator of the state of human rights in a country. Similarly, Section 2c on "Freedom of Religion" has been expanded for many countries. Increased attention has also been given in most reports to the status of women. In addition to expanding the treatment of the general situation of women and minorities in the final section of the report, we have addressed specific cases of discrimination in the respective applicable categories of human rights.

Preparation of the Report

The report must be submitted to Congress by January 31. To comply, United States diplomatic missions are given guidance in September concerning the timing of submission of draft reports, format, and areas of interest to be discussed. Reports on countries in which there is no United States representation are prepared in the Department of State. After contributions are received from embassies and appropriate offices in the Department, a final draft is prepared under the coordination of the Bureau of Human Rights and Humanitarian Affairs and submitted to the Congress. Because of the preparation time required, it is possible that developments in the latter part of the year under review may not be fully reflected; every effort is made, however, to include reference to major events or significant changes in trends.

The reports are based upon all information available to the United States Government. Sources include American officials, officials of foreign governments, private citizens, victims of human rights abuse, congressional studies, intelligence information, press reports, international organizations, and non-governmental organizations concerned with human rights. Much of this information is already public. For obvious reasons much of our information cannot be attributed to specific sources.

We are particularly appreciative of, and make reference in most reports to, the role of non-governmental human rights organizations, ranging from groups in a single country to major organizations which concern themselves with human rights matters in larger geographic regions or over the entire world. Only two major non-governmental organizations, Amnesty International and Freedom House, attempt reports with world-wide coverage. References to their views and findings are included in most of our reports. Reports from some of these organizations are for periods ending well before the end of 1984. In many cases the observations will have remained valid through 1984, but in others the situation may have changed significantly. We have attempted in each report to consider and reflect this.

Our report also differs in coverage from reporting by some non-governmental organizations. For example, we believe that it is necessary to treat violations such as torture, murder, interference with a free press, and intimidation of the judiciary whether they are committed by governments or by opposition movements. This course is particularly essential in a period when many opposition and guerrilla movements maintain, to a greater or lesser degree, a state apparatus (e.g., control and administration of territory, flags, organized military units). We also regard political rights as fundamental and endeavor to discuss them in detail. Some private human rights organizations consider the use of capital punishment a human rights violation per se. Neither the Executive Branch nor the United States Supreme Court takes the position that the death penalty, imposed after due process in a legitimate judicial system, constitutes a violation of internationally recognized human rights or that it constitutes cruel and unusual punishment.

Extreme care has been taken to make these country reports objective and as comprehensive as space will allow. Given the reports' diverse readership, it is also important that they be as consistent as possible in both scope and quality of coverage. Therefore, particular attention has been paid to attaining a high standard of consistency despite the multiplicity of sources and the obvious problems related to varying degrees of access to information, structural differences in political and social systems, and trends in world opinion regarding human rights practices in specific countries.

Access presents the greatest obstacle to a consistent approach, especially since closed societies tend to have some of the worst human rights abuses. Our most detailed reporting comes from open societies, where access and evaluation are welcomed and facilitated by governments whose concern for human rights equals our own. Since information available from closed societies is more limited, the reports may differ markedly in terms of the evidence presented in discussing specific human rights violations.

There is also a conceptual difficulty in applying a single standard of evaluation to societies with differing cultural and legal traditions. Human rights observers tend to focus on the effectiveness of such modern, Western institutions as trial by jury, habeas corpus, a free press, parliaments, and elections, and to ignore non-Western, traditional institutions. It is not easy at times to decide whether adherence to certain indigenous traditions is a violation of human rights or an affirmation of them.

This problem of perspective also applies in discussing countries which face differing political and economic realities. A nation's stage of development or its geographic situation, for example, should never be regarded as an excuse for violations of human rights but must be taken into account in describing the human rights environment. Similarly, a particular country's human rights reputation, or the public scrutiny it may previously have received, cannot be ignored by anyone discussing its current human rights performance.

Rather than viewing a country in isolation, then, these reports take as their point of departure the world as it is and apply a consistent approach in assessing each country's human rights situation. While we have tried to make each report self-contained by including enough background information to place the human rights situation in context, readers who need to delve more deeply may wish to consult other sources, including previous country reports.

United States Human Rights Policy

Our human rights policy also faces the world as it is, not as we might wish or imagine it to be, with a commitment to active engagement as a consistent approach to a variety of challenging situations. As President Reagan has said, "human rights means working at problems, not walking away from them." This is a pragmatic policy which aims not at striking poses but at having a practical effect on the well-being of real people. At the same time, it is an idealistic policy, which expresses the continuing commitment of the United States to the cause of liberty and the alleviation of suffering.

Since America was created in order to make real a specific political vision, it follows that "human rights" is not something added onto our foreign policy, but is its ultimate purpose: the preservation and promotion of liberty in the world. In his address to the U.N. General Assembly in September 1984, President Reagan stated that the United States will continue to view concern for human rights as the moral center of our foreign policy.

Our human rights policy has two goals. First, we seek to improve human rights practices in numerous countries--to eliminate torture or brutality, to secure religious freedom, to promote free elections, and the like. A foreign policy indifferent to these issues would not appeal to the idealism of Americans, would be amoral, and would lack public support. Moreover, these are pragmatic, not utopian, actions for the United States. Our most stable, reliable allies are democracies.

As the second goal of our human rights policy, we seek a public association of the United States with the cause of liberty. This is an eminently practical goal: our ability to win international cooperation and defeat anti-American propaganda will be harmed if we seem indifferent to the fate of liberty. Friendly governments are often susceptible to confidential diplomacy, and we therefore use it rather than public denunciations. But if we never appear seriously concerned about human rights violations in friendly countries, our policy will seem one-sided and cynical. Thus, while the Soviet bloc presents the most serious long-term human rights problem, we cannot let it falsely appear that this is our only human rights concern.

Our human rights policy also has two tracks or sides, the negative and the positive. The negative side is embodied in the way we oppose (through act or word) specific human rights violations in the short term. On the positive side, strongly emphasized by the Reagan Administration, we seek over the long term to help democracy, the surest safeguard of human rights. It is a fact that most democracies have excellent human rights records; nothing is as likely as democracy to produce this result.

Obviously, the positive track of human rights policy is not a substitute for an immediate and active response, including sanctions, for human rights violations when they occur. But the Administration believes that we should treat not only the symptoms but the disease--that we should not only respond to human rights violations but also should work to establish democratic systems in which human rights violations are less likely to occur.

It is therefore encouraging to see real progress coming about in the strengthening of democratic institutions, particularly in Latin America and the Caribbean, to which President Reagan referred in his remarks commemorating Human Rights Day on December 10, 1984. Noting that today more than 90 percent of the people in that region live in nations either democratically governed or moving in that direction, the President pledged "to our neighbors the continued support and assistance of the United States as they transform our entire hemisphere into a haven for democracy, peace, and human rights."

Our efforts, and those of others, to keep human rights concerns a central focus of international relations face the continuing problem that activist human rights policies such as ours traditionally aim at affecting the domestic behavior of other countries, while governments are reluctant to alter their nation's political system for foreign policy reasons. Since the leverage that the United States does have is strongest in friendly countries, there is a danger that human rights policy might highlight and punish human rights violations in those countries while in effect giving unfriendly countries immunity. Moreover, a nation that came to display a general pattern of undermining or estranging friendly governments would obviously limit its future influence over them, including its influence over their human rights behavior. On the other hand, countries where we have little access and leverage include many countries which both restrict the human rights of their citizens and resist strongly any foreign effort to influence the situation. As an extreme example, a representative of Iran at the United Nations took the unprecedented step in 1984 of declaring that the Universal Declaration of Human Rights does not apply to them.

However, there appears to be growing acceptance, even among countries where human rights are not fully respected, of the validity of an international human rights agenda. Sensitivity to these annual country reports, for example, increasingly takes the form of constructive response, or at least a willingness on the part of the country concerned to engage in a discussion of its human rights image. Many countries which are strong supporters of human rights have, like us, established offices specifically responsible for international human rights policy. It is also noteworthy that in 1985 the thirty-five nations, East and West, who signed the Helsinki Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe will gather in Ottawa for a Human Rights Experts Meeting in May and again in Budapest in October for a Cultural Forum which will also be devoted significantly to discussing human rights. (See Appendices A and B for a fuller discussion of our human rights policy.)

International Institutions for the Protection of Human Rights

In line with the theme set early in the Reagan Administration, the United States has continued to insist in international forums on a policy of evenhandedness in dealing with human rights violations throughout the world.

The ~~40th sess~~ion of the U.N. Human Rights Commission (UNHRC) met in Geneva to consider, among other items on its agenda, the problem of human rights violations in Poland. However, unlike the two previous years, the Commission failed to extend the mandate of the Secretary General's special representative on Poland. It voted, instead, to postpone consideration of the resolution to continue the inquiry into the human rights situation in Poland until the Commission's 1985 session.

Nevertheless, on other issues, particularly Iran, Grenada, Nicaragua, Afghanistan and Cambodia, the Commission voted in ways which recognized the need for greater evenhandedness and fairness in dealing with human rights situations throughout the world. Two resolutions dealing with Grenada and Nicaragua which unfairly criticized the United States Government were moderated during the Commission session. In each case, the Commission members approved moderate substitute resolutions by consensus.

In addition, the Commission adopted over strong Soviet opposition two resolutions on Afghanistan (one calling for appointment of a Rapporteur), and one on Cambodia. On the question of Iran, the Commission voted to appoint a Special Rapporteur to "make a thorough study" of allegations of human rights abuses in Iran, following reports of summary and arbitrary executions, torture, detention without trial, religious intolerance and persecution, and the lack of an adequate judiciary.

The agenda for the 40th session of the Commission included the customary large number of items, most of them carry-overs from previous sessions. Several of these items have been the subject of repetitive resolutions by the Commission. These included items relating to human rights in Israeli-occupied territories, human rights in Chile, El Salvador, Bolivia, and Guatemala, human rights in South Africa, and a general item relating to the realization of "economic human rights" and a "right to development." The United States Government continues to be troubled by the Commission's emphasis on the "right to development," which the United States is not prepared to recognize as a basic human right, as well as its treatment of questions dealing with apartheid and the Middle East. In general, the Commission remained critical of human rights conditions in Latin America, criticizing Chile and Guatemala in the public session, in addition to the resolution on El Salvador. As had occurred during the 39th session of the United Nations General Assembly (UNGA), a double standard, which focuses solely on certain countries, and a partisan treatment of human rights questions often characterized the Commission's deliberations.

The General Assembly's Third Committee (Social and Humanitarian Affairs) voted on issues regarding, among others, racial discrimination, human rights in El Salvador, Chile, and Guatemala, Middle East issues, and self-determination. United States efforts served primarily to moderate excesses and to provide a forum for articulating the beliefs of the Administration, including emphasis on the hypocrisy of current double standards, discrimination against Latin American countries, and general indifference to violations by the Soviet Union and its Communist allies.

On the question of El Salvador, the United States was heartened by a resolution adopted December 7 after lengthy negotiations. Although it was not a draft we could support, because it interfered with the rights of sovereign nations regarding military assistance, among the positive results of this effort were the strong initiative in support of a draft resolution favorable to President Duarte's reform program; a considerably improved final text compared with past years; and a more balanced UNGA debate and outcome which should contribute toward further progress during the session of the UNHRC in 1985.

Adoption of a convention against torture provided the highlight of the 39th UNGA. On December 10, 1984 (Human Rights Day), the UNGA decided by consensus to adopt and open for signature a Convention Against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment. The final text of the convention is identical to the draft convention submitted by the UNHRC following seven years of negotiations, except for revisions to Articles 19 and 20 (concerning implementation) and a new Article 28 which expressly provides that States can make reservations about Article 20 at the time of ratification. Proponents of the convention achieved a key objective by avoiding the creation of a formal UNGA working group sought by convention opponents such as the USSR, which had the potential of burying the draft convention for several years and resulting in a significantly inferior text. Ambassador Richard Schifter, Alternate United States Representative to the 39th session of the UNGA, in remarks made on December 10, 1984, expressed the pleasure of the United States Government in joining consensus. Ambassador Schifter added that, although the compromise text limits the implementation mechanism of the Convention,

> In the final analysis, however, it is the states members of the international community which are morally responsible for implementing the existing prohibition against torture and other forms of ill-treatment. We hope that the convention just adopted will help mobilize the political will of states to end the resort to torture as an accepted practice of law enforcement agencies.

On that same day, December 10, 1984, the United Nations General Assembly celebrated the 36th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and President Reagan, in signing his annual Human Rights Day Proclamation, took the opportunity to reaffirm American commitment to the international standard set by the Universal Declaration.

EXPLANATION OF STATISTICAL TABLES

This report contains tables listing the amounts of U.S. bilateral assistance and multilateral development assistance provided for the fiscal years of 1982, 1983, and 1984. The tables appear at the end of the description of human rights conditions for each country which received such assistance during those fiscal years. In general, loans are reported as of the fiscal year of authorization and grants are reported for the fiscal year of obligation. Food for Peace commodities financed by grants under Title II of P.L. 480 are reported by dollar amount shipped during the fiscal year.

Data for AID for 1984 loans and grants are as indicated in the FY 1986 Congressional Presentation. All other data are as presented in "U.S. Overseas Loans and Grants and Assistance from International Organizations" (The Green Book).

U.S. bilateral assistance figures are broken down by two basic categories.

I) Economic Assistance

II) Military Assistance

For each category, the overall amounts are further broken down in two ways: first, to indicate the amount of aid provided in the form of loans and grants; and second, to indicate the amount provided under various programs (e.g., AID, Food for Peace, etc.).

In addition, the tables list the amount of loans (not generally considered "assistance") made by other U.S. government sources and the amounts committed by international agencies, such as multilateral financial institutions and United Nations agencies.

The 1984 statistics do not include Export-Import Bank figures, which were unavailable at the time of printing. Tables in which these loans would have been the only statistics reflected have therefore been omitted.

ANGOLA*

The People's Republic of Angola is ruled by a small group of officials within a single political party, the Marxist Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola (MPLA). President Jose Eduardo dos Santos is both head of state and chief of the party. The MPLA has established a one-party state with restrictions on freedom of expression and political opposition. All major policy decisions are made by the party Central Committee and Political Bureau. The intensification and expansion of fighting between the MPLA and the opposition National Union for the Total Independence of Angola (UNITA) to most areas of Angola accelerated the deterioration in respect for human rights through increased civilian casualties and disruption of the society in 1984.

At independence on November 11, 1975, the three major opposition groups which had fought Portuguese rule were engaged in a bloody civil war, marked by the intervention of both Cuban and South African forces. With Cuban and Soviet assistance, the MPLA succeeded by early 1976 in ousting the two rival movements from Luanda, the capital, and took power. Both rival groups, the National Front for the Liberation of Angola (FNLA) and especially UNITA, have continued to wage guerrilla warfare against the MPLA. UNITA apparently has the allegiance of a substantial portion of the population, has steadily expanded the scope and level of its military operations (it controls approximately one-third of Angola's territory), and has extended guerrilla operations from the southeast into northern and western Angola. UNITA has publicly stated that it favors a government of national unity and has not sought to establish an alternate government. In addition to UNITA and the FNLA, the separatist Front for the Liberation of the Enclave of Cabinda (FLEC) continued during 1984 to conduct sporadic guerrilla operations in Cabinda.

An estimated 30,000 Cuban combat troops support the MPLA forces in their operations against UNITA, including at strategic locations in central and southern Angola. The MPLA and UNITA, which have different ethnic bases of support, compete for the allegiance of civilian populations through both persuasion and intimidation and have accused one another of atrocities against civilians. Civilians are also caught in the middle of hostilities between the Southwest Africa People's Organization (SWAPO--a Namibian resistance movement with bases in Angola) and South Africa, which controls the territory of Namibia on Angola's southern border. SWAPO and South African forces have conducted military operations against each other in southern Angola. During 1984 South Africa occupied a salient in Cunene province in southern Angola, but has since agreed to a process of withdrawal.

The intensified civil war has resulted in large numbers of displaced persons in central and southern Angola and has severely disrupted the economy and government administration. The low prices of oil and diamonds, the two principal sources of Angola's revenue, and disruption in food production and transportation infrastructure caused by the hostilities, have exacerbated this serious economic situation. The intensified civil war has forced the Government to devote an even larger portion of its financial resources to the military. Both the MPLA and UNITA have made efforts to provide humanitarian assistance to the displaced persons.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

The intensified civil war in Angola has resulted in numerous allegations that MPLA, UNITA, and South African forces have killed civilians and that the MPLA and UNITA have executed political prisoners. While there is little specific substantiation of the various claims and counter-claims, circumstantial evidence indicates that all the parties have on some occasions arbitrarily executed prisoners.

The fighting has also resulted in hundreds of civilian deaths. Some of these deaths were inadvertently caused by military operations, but others have been deliberately perpetrated by the opposing forces in order to intimidate civilian populations. Roads are mined in many places, and civilians have died as a result of guerrilla actions, such as attacks on trains. There are no reliable casualty figures. UNITA and the MPLA have both publicly and repeatedly accused each other of practicing terrorism against their respective supporters, including killing or maiming civilians. UNITA has charged that Cuban and Angolan forces have attacked civilians. No conclusive evidence exists to substantiate these claims and counter-claims.

b. Disappearance

There is no information to confirm that abductions, secret arrests, or clandestine detentions are practiced by the MPLA security agencies, or by UNITA, although both sides have accused each other of such practices. Amnesty International reported in its 1984 report that it was continuing to investigate the disappearance of political prisoners arrested in 1977 and 1978 by the MPLA authorities.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There have been persistent allegations of torture and mistreatment in Angolan prisons, but information is insufficient to determine the extent to which torture is practiced by the police, security services, and armed forces.

The prisons are overcrowded, with substandard diet and sanitation, but these conditions seem to reflect the poor state of the economy rather than deliberate maltreatment. Some reports have alleged that foreigners are not well treated, but Americans who have been imprisoned in Angola have been relatively well treated and have had access to available medical care.

Prison authorities reportedly have wide latitude in the treatment of prisoners. Treatment of political prisoners at the prisons controlled by the Ministry of State Security reportedly is harsher than treatment in the regular prisons. Mistreatment reportedly includes solitary confinement, confiscation of personal effects, physical intimidation, including beatings and threats, and prolonged interrogation with the use of force. Prison visits appear to be arbitrarily restricted in many instances. Foreign advisers, including Cubans and East Germans, are involved in assisting the MPLA security services and may be involved in helping to run state security prisons. State security detention centers are scattered throughout the country, and very little information is available on conditions at these facilities. Captured UNITA supporters have been put on public display by the MPLA.

There is very limited information available on the situation and administrative structure within the UNITA-held areas. Hence it is not possible to comment on UNITA practices in much of this report. It is known, however, that UNITA holds a number of foreign and MPLA prisoners, captured in the course of military operations, in makeshift facilities in its areas of control in southeastern Angola. There are no reports that UNITA has mistreated foreign or MPLA prisoners. During 1984 UNITA cooperated with the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) in releasing foreign prisoners it held. None of those released alleged that they had been mistreated.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Two of the most persistently and frequently reported charges of human rights violations have been arbitrary arrest and imprisonment without due process. Numerous reports allege that individuals are arrested and imprisoned on suspicion or denunciation by others and, in some cases, held for years without being notified of the charges against them.

Under Angolan law, persons suspected of committing serious acts against the security of the state may be held by the Ministry of State Security without charge for an initial period of three months, renewable for a further period of three months. Such detainees need not be presented to a judge within 48 hours of their arrest, as otherwise stipulated in the code of criminal procedure, and apparently have no right to challenge the grounds of their detention by invoking provisions of the code concerning habeas corpus. After six months' detention without charge, the detainee is supposed to be informed of the accusations against him, with the state security service either informing the public prosecutor of the case against the suspect or releasing him. Once the case is presented to the public prosecutor, there does not appear to be a specific time limit within which the suspect must be brought to trial. Many political prisoners have reportedly been held for years without being tried. The exact number of political prisoners is not known.

The deterioration of the security situation has contributed to abrogation of judicial safeguards and due process. In 1983, the MPLA established regional military councils throughout much of Angola. The councils, responsible directly to President dos Santos, have the authority to restrict the movement of people and goods, as well as to requisition people and goods without compensation, and to try crimes against the security of the state. This was followed by creation of "people's vigilance brigades" for urban areas. The powers of the vigilance brigades are not clear, but they are tasked with general administration and "protecting the people and ensuring public order and stability."

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution states that no citizen shall be arrested and brought to trial except under the terms of the law and guarantees the right of the accused to defense, but there is insufficient evidence to determine to what extent these rights exist in practice. Amnesty International has expressed concern that defendants may not have been given adequate opportunities to defend themselves and often appeared to have received little real assistance from legal counsel during their trials. The right of appeal exists in some cases, but it is not known whether this provides a practical safeguard for the accused. Judicial lines of authority are unclear, especially since the new regional military councils have been given responsibility for the trial of offenses against the security of the state, including "economic crimes." It is not known which trials are public and under what rules of procedure the various military and civilian courts operate. The Constitution provides for a People's Supreme Court, but its jurisdiction is not known.

In October a number of sentences were handed down in a case involving diamond smuggling and espionage which had received wide public attention both inside Angola and internationally. In the instance of the one death sentence (later commuted to six years imprisonment), the Government's case was based, at least partly, on highly questionable evidence and the defendant was apparently not given adequate opportunity to defend himself.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Although the Constitution guarantees the inviolability of the home and privacy of correspondence, arbitrary searches of homes have been alleged, and there is some interference with private correspondence, either through censorship or interruption of delivery of mail.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution guarantees freedom of expression "in the context of the achievement of the basic objectives of the People's Republic of Angola." Censorship exists and the Government runs the media. Opposition views are not aired. The prominent Angolan writer Fernando Costa de Andrade Ndunduma was arrested in late 1982 and is still being detained for "improper use of the right of criticism" because he wrote and had performed a play critical of the President.

The Government is especially sensitive to criticism in the foreign press. Angola has since independence in 1975 restricted the travel of foreign correspondents to Angola and has occasionally expelled foreign reporters, e.g., an Agence France Presse reporter was expelled in mid-1983. Angola, together with the other "Front Line" States, endorsed the Kadoma Declaration in July 1983, banning the travel of South Africa-based correspondents to the Front Line States. The circulation of Western journals and periodicals in Angola is tightly restricted.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of assembly is denied to any political group or movement other than the MPLA. All other political movements have been banned. The Angolan media frequently announce the arrest of UNITA sympathizers. There are numerous unconfirmed reports of arrests of people who voice support of opposition movements or alternative political systems. The recently established people's vigilance brigades and martial-law climate throughout the country tend further to restrict freedom of assembly and association.

The only trade union movement in Angola is the National Union of Angolan Workers, which is controlled by the party and is a member of the continent-wide, Ghana-based, Organization of African Trade Union Unity. Traditional labor union activities and rights are tightly controlled by the Government. Strikes are prohibited by law as a crime against the security of the state. In 1984, the Angolan Government was cited by the International Labor Organization (ILO) in Geneva for being in violation of ILO Convention 105, which prohibits forced labor. The basis of this citation is Angolan legislation, still in force, which provides for the imposition of penal sanctions involving compulsory labor for breaches of labor discipline and participation in strikes.

c. Freedom of Religion

Although the Constitution guarantees the inviolability of freedom of conscience and belief and provides for separation of church and state, the MPLA publicly emphasizes the importance of propagating "atheism" and has been critical of religious activities. The overwhelming majority of the Angolan population is Christian, however, and the MPLA has not moved to close down churches. Church services are regularly held and there is widespread attendance. Foreign and Angolan missionaries are allowed to carry out activities. Reportedly, UNITA allows religious liberty in the areas it controls and in which it operates, but obviously the ability of religious personnel to carry out activities in Angola has been circumscribed by the intensification of the civil war.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

As a result of the intensification of the civil war, the Government is acutely security-conscious and has tightly restricted travel. Travel by road in most areas of Angola is dangerous. There is a pass system within Angola, and foreigners are generally prohibited from traveling outside the principal cities. The regional military councils are empowered to restrict the movement of people and goods. UNITA has publicly warned that it considers all of Angola to be a war zone and that it cannot guarantee the safety of persons traveling there.

Angolan citizens are allowed to travel abroad, but this travel is carefully controlled by restrictions on passport issuance and exit visas, and by currency restrictions. Emigration is restricted. The Government limits travel to Angola through a selective and stringent visa policy.

ANGOLA

Angola is a signatory to the U.N. Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees and has allowed refugees to enter Angola. There are approximately 70,000 Namibian, 20,000 Zairian, and 6,000 South African refugees in Angola. Since mid-1980, between 120,000 and 150,000 former Zairian refugees in Angola returned home under the auspices of the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees.

The Government has offered amnesty to members of the opposition FNLA and claims that a large number of FNLA adherents and their families have surrendered to MPLA authorities, most recently at the end of September. It is not known how former FNLA leaders have been treated, but there have been some reports of the arrest and harassment of former FNLA sympathizers who have returned to Angola. Both as a result of fear of persecution and as a result of flight from hostilities, approximately 200,000 Angolans have taken refuge in Zaire since 1975, and an estimated 73,000 have taken refuge in Zambia. There have been indications in the past that the Government was pressing for the forcible repatriation of Angolan refugees in Zambia who are UNITA sympathizers, but this has not taken place; however, the Government cooperated in the repatriation of several planeloads of Angolans in early 1984. Of the 400,000 Angolans who have left the country since independence, the Government claims that 180,000 have returned, but this claim cannot be verified.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Angola is ruled by a small group of officials within the party apparatus of the ruling Marxist-Leninist MPLA. The Constitution provides for popular participation in the political process, but the MPLA is the only legal party, and activities by all opposition groups have been banned. Citizens, therefore, do not have the right to change their government.

In effect, political activity is limited to participation in the party or to one of its controlled and sanctioned organizations such as its youth wing, the Angolan Women's Organization, or the trade union movement. The Government has established political institutions consistent with its ideology, with political power centered in the 11-member Politburo and 65-member Central Committee. Party membership is very restricted, with under 30,000 members out of a population of 7 million, according to the MPLA media. The Constitution provides that the popularly-elected national People's Assembly, established in 1981, is the supreme organ of state power. There are also people's assemblies at the provincial and local level. Only candidates chosen and endorsed by the party are elected to the people's assemblies, and key members of the party also hold leadership positions in the people's assemblies. The people's assemblies endorse measures proposed by the party at the national and local levels.

Angolan citizenship is denied to individuals who claim another nationality or who have committed homicide, opposed the "liberation struggle," or joined clandestine organizations opposed to the "decolonization process." Citizens 18 years of age or older are entitled to vote and hold office.

ANGOLA

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Amnesty International stated in its 1984 report that it is concerned about the imprisonment of people for criticizing government policies or officials, long-term detention without trial, unfair political trials, and mistreatment of prisoners. Amnesty International has adopted the imprisoned writer Ndunduma as a prisoner of conscience, and claims to be aware of other long-term detainees accused of supporting opposition movements. Amnesty International has also appealed for commutation of death sentences imposed by the People's Revolutionary Tribunal and military courts, and has issued a report concerning its continuing concerns regarding extra-judicial executions and disappearances during 1977-1978.

The International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) has helped arrange the release of foreign nationals held by UNITA and has occasionally been allowed to visit prisoners held by UNITA. The MPLA has not allowed the ICRC to visit political prisoners. The MPLA has allowed the ICRC and United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund (UNICEF) to operate in areas it controls, and UNITA allows the ICRC to operate in areas it controls or is contesting. Freedom House rates Angola "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The MPLA has established as its goal the transformation of Angola into a "socialist" economy, and the major sectors of the economy--oil, diamonds, and banking--have been nationalized. The right to private property is, however, guaranteed by the Constitution, and a small portion of the economy, mainly in the agricultural sector, still operates under private ownership.

Although Angola is potentially one of the richest countries in Africa, its economy has been severely damaged as a result of this transformation in the midst of civil war, with attendant dependence on Communist-country support and disruption of agricultural production, plus the decline in the prices of oil and diamonds, its two principal sources of revenue, and by the exodus of skilled manpower. The intensification of the fighting has devastated the country's infrastructure and has forced the Government to divert most of its assets to the military. It has made virtually impossible further economic development, except the exploitation of offshore oil resources which UNITA has not attacked to date.

Payments to the Eastern bloc for military equipment and for the Cuban combat troops have become a heavy burden on the economy. Although thousands of civilian Cuban and East European advisors are working in technical and professional positions, Angola still faces a critical shortage of skilled manpower. Of the approximately 500,000 Portuguese residents prior to independence, only 30,000 remain. UNITA's declared policy of targeting economic installations and its warning that foreigners working in Angola do so at their own risk have exacerbated the general economic problems.

Some 200,000-500,000 persons in central, eastern, and southern Angola have been displaced from their homes as a result of the combination of civil strife and drought. They are suffering from severe malnutrition and, in numerous cases, starvation. Many rural inhabitants have abandoned the countryside to seek food and safety in urban areas, such as Luanda, which have been overwhelmed by the influx. As a result of the rural exodus, crops are not being planted. There are severe food shortages in urban areas, and public services are severely taxed.

In these circumstances, during 1984 the MPLA continued efforts to obtain food assistance from Western countries and various international organizations. A number of Western countries provide economic and technical assistance. ICRC and UNICEF are playing key roles in distribution of humanitarian food and medical assistance, including in UNITA-held areas.

Available data highlight the poor quality of life. The population growth rate is 2.7 percent, with high infant mortality of 145.4 per 1,000 live births, and life expectancy at birth of only 43 years. Health care is available to no more than a small fraction of the total population. Gross national product per capita in 1982 was approximately $939, but this reflects the oil revenues from the Cabinda field and has little meaning to the bulk of the population in the midst of civil war. The Government has concentrated efforts on improving the educational system, and there is a high level of enrollment in primary schools in non-combat areas. The current literacy rate is estimated at about 30 percent.

Women participate in the MPLA, not only in the Angolan Women's Organization, but also in the higher levels of the party. Social, cultural, and traditional factors tend to limit the participation of women at the highest level of the party. Three members of the Central Committee are women.

Both the MPLA and UNITA have primarily ethnic bases of support--the MPLA among the Kimbundu, and UNITA among the Ovimbundu. While they have worked with mixed success to broaden popular support, both groups show political favoritism towards their own ethnic group. There are no formal ethnic or racial restrictions on participation in the political process, and whites and mesticos occupy a number of high-level positions within the MPLA.

BENIN

Benin obtained its independence from France in 1960 and experienced numerous changes in government until 1972 when the Beninese army intervened in a coup which brought President Mathieu Kerekou to power. Subsequently, the new leaders initiated a Marxist-Leninist government with a single political party, the People's Revolutionary Party, and introduced a new Constitution (1977). The party is directed by a small leadership group, in which the influence of the military remains important.

Continuing political tensions during the mid-1970's had a chilling effect on the exercise of both political and personal liberties. The Government arrested a number of persons for opposing government policies of social and political transformation. In January 1977, an unsuccessful attempt to overthrow the Kerekou Government initiated a period of intense suspiciousness toward both foreigners and domestic critics. In recent years, however, as the Government has consolidated its authority, tolerance toward divergent political views has increased.

Consistent with this trend, the Government on August 1, 1984, declared an amnesty for all political prisoners except those implicated in the January 1977 coup attempt. Eighty-five prisoners, some of whom had been held since 1973, were released under the amnesty. According to government sources, only three persons, all charged with involvement in the 1977 coup attempt, remain in detention.

With an annual average per capita income of $326, Benin ranks statistically among the world's poorest countries. The majority of its population depends upon subsistence agriculture and small trade for its livelihood. At the same time, despite steady population growth, Benin remains a net exporter of agricultural produce. Government policy has given priority to expanding agricultural production. Owing to the mixed experience in recent years with large, state-owned corporations, the Government has also given new emphasis to the encouragement of small private enterprises. Benin's active private commercial sector has traditionally played a strong role in the economy and has been little affected by the change of political orientation.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no reported cases of political killing by the Government in Benin in 1984.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of disappearances or secret arrests in 1984.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There were no reports in 1984 alleging torture or cruel and unusual punishment of prisoners or detainees. Prison facilities and conditions in Benin are poor, and overcrowding and poor sanitation are common complaints. Friends and relatives are expected to provide food for prisoners. Allegations of torture in previous years have been made to Amnesty International and other human rights organizations, primarily on the basis of reports received from Beninese living abroad. Instances of physical and psychological abuse undoubtedly occur; and there is one report that some political prisoners released in the August 1, 1984 amnesty had suffered injury or illness during incarceration. There have been no reports of discrimination against prisoners because of sex, religion, or national origin.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Beninese Constitution states that no citizen can be arrested without a decision from an established judicial body. In practice, persons have been detained indefinitely at the discretion of the Government, without recourse to legal assistance or a judicial hearing. In the past, many arrests occurred during periods of high political tension. Although arrests are not publicized, no special attempt is made to keep them secret. According to official sources, 6 persons were detained for alleged political offenses in 1984; 26 in 1983.

In the general amnesty of August 1, 1984, the Government released a number of students arrested in 1979 and 1980 for demonstrating against the Government. These students had been the subject of appeals by various governments and international human rights agencies.

According to official reports, only three persons remained in detention on political charges after the August 1 amnesty; all are charged with involvement in the 1977 coup attempt. There are reports that four other persons were "re-arrested" after the amnesty, but these are individuals who had either fled the country prior to sentencing, or had escaped from prison.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Benin's judicial system, largely inherited from the French, is allowed to function independently in all but sensitive political cases. In such instances, defendants may or may not be permitted legal counsel or granted a public hearing. In recent years, the Government has relied principally upon the established civilian court system, known as the "People's Courts," which are presently organized at the provincial and national levels. The highest court of appeal is the Central People's Court.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution affirms the inviolability of the home and requires that a warrant be obtained from a magistrate before the police may enter a private residence. For the most part, this constitutional right to privacy is respected. However, unauthorized or forced entries are occasionally alleged, especially in cases considered politically sensitive or threatening by the Government. Petty corruption by functionaries also poses a potential threat to certain personal rights, such as protection against illegal search and seizure. Allegations that police and security officials monitor telephone and mail service to suspected persons remain unconfirmed but cannot be dismissed.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Virtually all of the media in Benin are owned and operated by the Government. This includes the one daily newspaper, as well as the sole radio and television stations. The media carry only those stories and views that are approved by or serve the interests of the party and the Government. While the Government has been prepared to tolerate criticisms of specific actions, public opposition to the Government itself, or its basic policy orientations, is not permitted. Apart from the government-owned media, two private journals are published in Benin: one by the Catholic Church dealing primarily with religious and social news; the second a monthly magazine of African news and opinion aimed primarily at a regional audience. The latter deals regularly with political topics. Both presumably exercise prudence in treating sensitive issues or views. Neither has been the object of direct government censorship or interference. There have been no reported efforts to censor or prohibit the receipt of publications from abroad. No attempt is made to interfere with the reception of foreign radio broadcasts, which are widely listened to. Discussion and debate at Benin's National University is wide-ranging and uninhibited. In recent years contacts and partnerships with foreign academic institutions have been encouraged.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Public meetings are allowed, but all meetings of a political nature must be sponsored by the single party. A number of social, service, and professional organizations (including Lions and Rotary) exist and maintain active international affiliations. In the immediate post-independence period, labor unions, which still represent less than five percent of the labor force, exercised important political and economic influence. Under the present Constitution, labor unions are organs of the party and Government, and are unified under a national organizational umbrella confederation, the National Confederation of Workers' Unions (NCWU). Local unions do have the right to bargain and negotiate with individual employers, obliging the Government to act as arbiter as necessary. The right to strike is not guaranteed under the 1977 Constitution, and strikes are not condoned by the Government. Such labor actions as do occasionally occur usually take the form of work stoppages to protest specific grievances, e.g. late salary or scholarship payments. The NCWU is a member of the continent-wide Organization of African Trade Union Unity, based in Accra, and of the World Federation of Trade Unions based in Prague.

c. Freedom of Religion

Benin is a religiously diverse society embracing some 40 different faiths, including Islam, Christianity, and traditional religions. Adherence to a particular faith does not confer any special privilege or status. With the exception of one group, Celestial Christianity, which has been declared illegal by the Government, no restrictions are placed on religious ceremonies or teachings. Religious conversion is freely permitted. A number of international religious missions have operated for many years in Benin with the authorization of the Government.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Domestic movement is not restricted. Passport and exit permission are required for travel to countries beyond the West African region, but obtaining these does not present unusual problems. Economic rather than governmental constraints constitute the principal obstacle to travel outside the region. Emigration is a way of life, and many Beninese have gone to neighboring countries in search of employment. The Government encourages Beninese abroad to return home to contribute to the country's development.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Leadership is exercised by President Kerekou and a small group of senior officials, many of whom also hold positions in government. The electoral process allows for citizen participation in the nomination of candidates for the National Revolutionary Assembly, in theory the principal decision-making body of the Government. Party membership is not a requisite for participation in this process or for high office or civil service employment. The final selection of candidates for the single national slate, however, is made by the party leadership. No opposition parties or slates are permitted. The Assembly itself rarely takes issue with policies formulated by the political leadership. According to government figures, 93 percent of all eligible voters participated in, and voted for the national slate in the last assembly elections on June 11, 1984.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government has traditionally regarded attempts to investigate human rights practices as interferences in its internal affairs. It has not responded officially to complaints previously brought by Amnesty International before the U.N. Commission on Human Rights regarding political prisoners and detainees. At the same time, government sensitivity toward both domestic and international criticism was probably a factor in the August 1984 decision to amnesty political prisoners, including a number of students. The 1984 Amnesty International Report noted the long detention of students and teachers. Also during the past year, regional representatives of the International Committee of the Red Cross have made several visits to Benin. Freedom House terms Benin "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Benin had an estimated annual per capita income of $307 in 1982. It is estimated that more than 80 percent of Benin's 3,894,000 people (1984) live in rural areas, where they are primarily engaged in subsistence agriculture; in 1979, it was estimated that 65 percent of the rural population fell below what was considered the absolute poverty line. The annual population growth rate is estimated at 3.1 percent, the infant mortality rate at 142.7 for every 1000 live births, and life expectancy at birth at 49.47 years (all 1984 estimates). Only 21 percent of the population had access to safe drinking water in 1979, comprising 52 percent of those living in urban areas, as opposed to only 16 percent of those in rural areas.

These statistics notwithstanding, Benin enjoys a relatively favorable climate and in most years has been able to produce more food than its population consumes. According to a 1977 estimate, calorie supply was 97.65 percent of requirements. The statistics also understate to some extent the country's actual income, much of which derives from informal trade with neighboring countries and is not reflected in official figures.

The Government has committed itself to a development strategy based on agricultural self-sufficiency and a more equitable distribution of income and social benefits. Over the last several years, 23 percent of the annual operating budget has been allocated for education, and 6 percent for health and other social services. This emphasis has been reflected in substantial improvements in both adult literacy and primary school enrollment figures. In 1980, the adult literacy rate was estimated at 27.9 percent: 39.8 percent for males, and 16.6 percent for females. In 1981, primary school enrollment was estimated at 67.36 percent of primary school-aged population: 93.8 percent of males, and 42.33 percent of females.

The Government's efforts to spur development through investments in large-scale state-owned agricultural and industrial projects have had disappointing results, in part due to external economic factors. As a consequence, renewed emphasis is being placed on the development of small-scale private enterprises in both farming and industry. A potentially serious constraint on the achievement of development plans is the incidence of corruption, a problem which the Government has acknowledged.

Benin's population comprises over 40 different ethnic groups. Exploitation of these differences in the past was cause of frequent political unrest and instability. The Government has made a commitment to eliminate discrimination on the basis of race, religion, or ethnicity. Historically women have played a major role in both agriculture and commerce. Constitutional guarantees of equal status for women have been supported by government policies. While there are currently no women in ministerial positions, a number of women hold executive level responsibilities in the Government, the National Assembly, and the party.

BOTSWANA

Botswana is a multi-party democracy, with constitutionally guaranteed universal suffrage for all persons 21 years of age and older. On September 8, 1984, some 227,000 citizens cast their ballots in the fifth general election since independence (1966). Voters selected representatives to the National Assembly from among candidates of five political parties which campaigned freely and without harassment. The constitutional rights of individuals in Botswana are protected by an independent judiciary. The police force and a small, well-disciplined army provide internal and external security. Botswana has made great strides in its 18 years of independence despite the minimal infrastructure inherited at independence, a dearth of skilled manpower, and severe climatic constraints imposed by insufficient rainfall.

Botswana encourages private enterprise and free trade. All citizens, including those whites who accepted Botswana citizenship, are free to participate in the economic and political life of the country. For the past several years, Botswana has been a haven for refugees from the political and military strife of neighboring countries. While the flow of refugees slowed during 1984, recent strife in South Africa and political maneuvering in Zimbabwe may lead to a further influx.

Botswana's human rights record is generally good. Citizens receive equal protection before the law; there have been no incidents of political violence; several women hold positions of importance in the public and private sector. Labor unions, however, are kept under close surveillance by the Government.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There have been no such instances in Botswana.

b. Disappearance

The Botswana Constitution provides for the protection of personal liberty. There have been no allegations of secret arrests or clandestine detentions in Botswana.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The government-owned newspaper reported the trial and sentencing of a policeman accused of beating a suspected criminal. Recently, the newspaper reported that a criminal suspect had alleged that police investigators had tortured him in the process of attempting to elicit a confession. An American citizen arrested on the charge of car theft also alleged that he had been tortured by the police; a police investigation of the incident concluded that there was insufficient evidence to support the allegation. The American citizen was declared a prohibited immigrant upon being found guilty of the criminal charge and has since left Botswana. While beatings of prisoners apparently occur occasionally, they do not appear to be a regular or government sanctioned practice.

Prisons are crowded but appear to provide an adequate diet, health care, and visits from family members. Flogging is permitted for infractions of prison rules. A law making flogging mandatory for certain criminal offenses (rape, attempted rape, armed robbery, burglary, housebreaking, and related offenses) was upheld by the High Court in December 1983. Tribal courts, presided over by a chief, in which jurisdiction is limited to minor offenses, may also sentence individuals to be flogged. No summary executions have occurred.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Botswana Constitution contains provisions protecting citizens from arbitrary arrest. There are no political prisoners in Botswana, and preventive detention is illegal. There is a requirement that the police bring a suspect before a magistrate for charging within 48 hours of his arrest. Suspects must be released after 48 hours unless the magistrate issues a warrant of detention which is valid for 14 days. Every 14 days, the police must appear before the magistrate and show they are making progress in the case. To date, there have been no known instances of abuse of this system.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The right of a fair public trial is provided by law and is honored in practice. Defendants are entitled to counsel; consultation between defendants and counsel may be held in private. The judiciary is independent of the executive and military. The High Court has ruled that one may not be compelled to testify against oneself. Silence cannot be construed as guilt, and the burden of proof remains with the prosecution. All trials are held in public. Provisions exist for conducting closed hearing trials relating to security cases, but the High Court exercises oversight. Earlier this year, the police received a rebuke from the High Court for insisting that a member of its Special Branch be tried in camera on the charge of being on the payroll of a foreign country. The High Court heard the accused's appeal but upheld his conviction and the sentence (two years imprisonment).

There are no special courts to deal with security or political offenses. Although the Botswana Defence Force Act provides for military courts, none as yet has been established, and cases over which the military has jurisdiction are referred to the Attorney General and the civilian court system. Problems in the administration of justice center mainly on the difficulty of recruiting sufficient numbers of qualified judicial personnel and court reporters.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

These rights are safeguarded by law and respected in practice. A search warrant issued by a magistrate is required for an official to enter a private residence, except in cases of suspected diamond theft or drug trafficking. There have been no reported instances in which this authority was used during the past year.

BOTSWANA

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and the press are guaranteed by the Constitution and are respected in practice. The government-owned daily newspaper (English and Setswana) impartially covered the statements of opposition parties and aired the views of opposition candidates during the recent election campaign. A privately-owned weekly paper (English only) published a wider range of news, including articles--not always laudatory--on public figures. Botswana has signed the Kadoma Declaration, which bans entry of journalists based in South Africa. However, the Government has not taken any active steps to implement the resolution nor to hinder the movement of any journalists in their efforts to collect information or report on events.

During the recent political campaign, opposition leaders protested that the Government was discriminating against them by taping public speeches of their candidates, but not those of the ruling party's candidates. The Government responded that the Constitution gave the right to tape political speeches, but thereafter conspicuously taped the speeches of all candidates. In one case, the Government alleged that a candidate had incited the military to overthrow the Government; the High Court dismissed the case for lack of sufficient evidence.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of assembly is a well-established tradition in Botswana exemplified in the Kgotla, a communal meeting, similar to a New England town meeting, where citizens freely question leaders and voice opinion on local policies. During the recent political campaign, all the candidates, including the Vice President and cabinet ministers, were exposed to sharp questions from their constituents. Large gatherings require local police approval, which is routinely given. Demonstrations are permitted so long as order is maintained. Organizers are required to submit a detailed plan for any demonstration and are personally responsible for ensuring that the plan is followed.

Unions have the legal right to strike after exhausting established procedures, which require that the Government be invited to attempt to arbitrate the dispute. The last strike occurred in 1976. Unions have chafed under government regulations which prohibit the contribution of union funds from outside Botswana and require that all union leaders be full-time working members of the trade covered by their union, thus preventing employment of paid full-time union organizers. In May, the Government postponed a proposed election of the Botswana Federation of Trade Union (BFTU) officers on the grounds that the Government had not been advised sufficiently in advance of the elections; elections were held a month later. Unions associate freely with international organizations and members attend international conferences. The BFTU is affliated with the democratic oriented International Confederation of Free Trade Unions in Brussels, and is also a member of the Ghana-based Organization of African Trade Union Unity.

c. Freedom of Religion

Open practice of religion is permitted and encouraged. There is no state religion. While most residents identify themselves with Christian sects, active groups of Muslims, Hindus, Bahais, and others practice their faiths freely. Religious affiliation is neither an advantage nor disadvantage politically or socially. The Government has attempted to remain aloof from internal problems in various churches, particularly those which were founded as branches of South African churches. In recent years, some members have attempted to dissociate themselves from control of the South African mother church and establish an independent Botswana church. This has created problems of ownership of church property.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Botswana citizens are subject to virtually no restrictions on emigration or repatriation. Domestic and foreign travel is unrestricted as well. Passports, in general, are easily obtained. Refugees documented by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) are generally required to live in the settlement at Dukwe in northern Botswana where conditions are relatively good, due largely to contributions from international donor organizations. Refugees may be authorized to live elsewhere for reasons such as employment or schooling. As with other foreigners in Botswana, refugees are not permitted to accept employment opportunities which could be filled by a citizen. As a result of allegations from some refugee-producing countries that refugees are using Botswana as a sanctuary while they involve themselves in anti-government activities in their home countries, the Government of Botswana has declared that any refugee found outside Dukwe without government permission will be considered to have abandoned refugee status and will be repatriated immediately. Indications are that the policy has been effective as a deterrent to questionable activities by refugees. While some reports allege that the Government of Botswana has returned a large number of bona fide refugees to their country of origin, there is no evidence that this has occurred in more than a few instances. At the end of 1983, 39 refugees involved in a major disturbance at the refugee camp were repatriated without following UNHCR procedures. Two South Africans and one Malawian have also been repatriated. Some refugees who leave Botswana on U.N. travel documents issued by Botswana encounter difficulties in returning.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

On September 8, 1984 adult citizens of Botswana (21 years of age and over) participated in their fifth free and democratic elections since independence in 1966. Five political parties competed in the election, although only two of them contested most of the 34 constituencies. Lack of financial resources and personnel prevented the other three from similar participation. An estimated 70 percent of eligible voters registered, and 86 percent of the registered voters actually voted. Voter turnout was the greatest since independence. No violent incidents occurred during the campaign or the election itself. No incidents of gross voting fraud have come to light. However, one of the opposition parties requested the High Court to rule that one constituency election should be held again due to "irregularities." The High Court found in favor of the opposition and a new election took place December 1 for the constituency held by Botswana's Vice-President. Local newspapers, independent and government-owned, reported the speeches and campaign programs of all parties.

The political rights of women and minority groups generally are observed. There are two female members of Parliament, one of whom is also Minister of External Affairs. The other works as Executive Secretary of the majority political party. The one white member of Parliament is also a minister and the speaker of the National Assembly, a prominent businessman, is also white. Only the 50,000 Basarwa or "Bushmen" remain generally unrepresented in government and ignored. While the Government does not oppress them or deny them rights, including the right to vote, it does little to help or protect a minority whose way of life is changing rapidly due to recent economic development in Botswana.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Botswana cooperates with international agencies concerned with human rights. Relations with the office of the UNHCR, the only international human rights organization active in Botswana, are friendly and open. There are no Botswana-based organizations set up to observe, report, or contest human rights violations. Although the Botswana Government consistently has responded promptly and forthrightly to the inquiries it has received about the human rights situation in Botswana, the UNHCR encountered initial difficulty obtaining information about the refugees repatriated in December 1983. The Government eventually cooperated and agreed to follow UNHCR procedures in the future.

As a thinly populated country surrounded by larger and more powerful neighbors, Botswana seldom comments publicly on alleged human rights violations in those countries. Botswana does join with other African governments in condemning apartheid in South Africa, however. Amnesty International stated in its 1984 report that there was not sufficient information available to include an entry on Botswana. Freedom House terms Botswana "free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

When Botswana became independent in 1966, its developed infrastructure was negligible and per capita gross national product (GNP) was estimated at only $69. In 1982, per capita GNP was $902 (World Bank data). The exploitation of mineral resources has helped bring about economic development and improve the economic and social welfare of the people. A third year of drought has created havoc in the agricultural and construction sectors of the economy, forcing the Government to spend heavily (about $25 million) on drought relief aid. The percentage of urban population with access to potable water increased from 71 percent in 1968 to 95 percent in 1975. Due to the difficulties of supplying potable water to Botswana's widely scattered rural population, it was estimated in 1975 that only 45 percent of the rural population had access to potable water. In 1977, it was estimated that 94 percent of the calorie supply required for Botswana's population was available in the country. Because of the drought, the country has become heavily dependent on imported foodstuffs, either purchased or donated. Life expectancy increased from 41.0 years in 1968 to 61.26 years in 1984.

Women hold approximately 24 percent of paid employment positions. An estimated 41 percent of central government employees are women, many of them in high-level positions. While there is little overt discrimination, statistics suggest that social custom elevates the rights and privileges of men above those of women. Some 40 percent of rural households (83 percent of the total population is rural) are headed by women, and generally their economic situation--access to capital, seeds, labor, and draft animals--is significantly worse than that of households headed by men. Women about to marry may choose civil marriage, in which all property is held in common, or customary marriage, which recognizes individual property brought to a marriage. Most women are not aware, however, of the implications of these alternatives. Often a married woman is unable to obtain a bank loan without the signature of her husband, or an unmarried woman without the signature of her father. The Government has participated in the preparation of a handbook outlining women's rights in Botswana and established preference points for women who seek goverment-sponsored development loans.

Botswana has made considerable progress in providing educational opportunities. The adjusted primary school enrollment ratio increased from 56 percent in 1968 to 89 percent in 1978 and rose to 93 percent in 1979. The difference in the 1978 ratio for boys (80 percent) and girls (98 percent) is due primarily to the custom of using school-age boys to herd cattle. The adult literacy rate is estimated at approximately 40 percent (1971 World Bank figure and the latest available).

Rural incomes are much lower than urban incomes, one factor leading to increased rural migration during the past decade. The urban population increased from 8 percent in 1971 to 17 percent in 1981 and probably has increased again during three years of drought. Despite general improvement in the economy during the past decade, poverty still afflicts a large proportion of the population. The most recent estimates in 1979, which take into account an annual population growth rate of about 3.3 percent (1984 World Bank data), are that 55 percent of the rural population and 40 percent of the urban population have incomes below the absolute poverty level.

The Government of Botswana promises equal treatment for all its citizens in the distribution of social services. However, since most of the Bushmen occupy the harsh and remote areas of the Kalahari desert where population density is very low, there are few clinics and schools available to them. The Government is building some facilities at the edge of the desert where they serve as a magnet for Bushman families. This in turn creates new problems as the occupants of the desert--hunter/gatherers--are forced into wage labor and cattle herding where they tend to be absorbed into Tswana society.

BURKINA FASO

Burkina Faso is ruled by the military, with Captain Thomas Sankara in the leadership position of President of Burkina Faso and of the National Council of the Revolution. Sankara, who came to power in a military coup in August 1983, appoints the members of the Government in the name of the National Council, and utilizes a Council of Ministers as the main forum for ongoing political decisions.

The country has experienced a series of political upheavals since 1980, and the current leadership has changed the name from Upper Volta in an effort to institutionalize its revolutionary authority.

The Government and National Council undertake their actions in the name of the people, but political parties remain suspended (since 1980) and there is no talk of returning the country to constitutional rule. Instead, the Government is using a growing network of Committees for the Defense of the Revolution (CDRS), organized at national, regional, and local levels, to mobilize the population and promote its revolutionary goals. The national CDR leadership is appointed by the Government, and it organized elections during 1984 to select local committee leaders.

The Sankara regime's human rights record was mixed for 1984. The Government released ex-Ministers held under house arrest following the 1983 coup in August 1984. However, throughout the year it made arbitrary arrests, and imposed brief detention without trial or charges of labor leaders, potential political opponents, and others suspected of being hostile to the regime. The Government also conducted political trials of former government and political leaders outside the traditional judicial system in "peoples courts" where defendants had no recourse to legal counsel, and it sanctioned the execution in June of seven people, five military and two civilians, following a summary court martial convicting them of coup plotting. In addition, the Government dismissed or retired civil servants, military, and police accused of hostility to the revolution for reasons ranging from misconduct to inappropriate attitudes. The only independent newspaper suspended publication in June following the burning of its presses by unidentified armed men.

Burkina Faso is one of the poorest countries in the world. Its economy is based on agriculture and animal husbandry. This former French colony has a literacy rate of about 9 percent and about 90 percent of its 7 million inhabitants live in rural areas. Donor assistance is valued at nearly twice the national budget.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

In a total break with the traditional judicial process and even a departure from procedures of the peoples court system instituted in 1983, seven people charged with coup-plotting were sentenced to death by a secret court martial on June 11. They were executed a few hours later. Although the Government press published what it called "confession" letters, many people doubt the Government's allegations. In July the Deputy Chief of the Armed Forces was gunned down in Ouagadougou in a gangland style attack after dark. His assailants have never been caught.

There were no reports of disappearances during 1984.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There were no reports of torture being inflicted on prisoners or of cruel, inhuman, or degrading punishment, although the poverty of the society in general results in poor prison conditions.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Ministers from the previous regime, who had been put under house arrest at the time of the 1983 coup, were released in a gesture of reconciliation in August, on the first anniversary of the coup. Only former President Jean-Baptiste Ouedraogo is known to remain in custody without charges, and no time has been set for his trial or release. Reports of arbitrary arrest followed by detention without charges for as much as four or five days are increasing. Some of these arrests have been publicized, such as the arrest of labor leaders in March, which provoked a teachers strike; but others, such as purged leaders of the Committees for the Defense of the Revolution (CDR) in August, have never been acknowledged. Several prominent intellectuals and former government officials remain out of the country in self-imposed exile. Habeas corpus does not exist in Burkina Faso. Laws permitting preventive detention for a maximum of 72 hours, renewable once in criminal cases, are followed in practice.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Between January and June 1984 the People's Revolutionary Courts, created in late 1983 with jurisdiction over state security and political crimes, heard the cases of nearly 100 people. The accused included about 30 high-ranking government officials from the Third Republic (1978-1980) and the Zebro Government (1980-1982) and their associates. Charges centered on misuse of government funds, embezzlement, and "illicit enrichment." Former President Lamizana, who led the country from 1966-1980, and several other defendants were acquitted. Sentences for others ranged from modest fines and suspended prison sentences to several years in prison and fines of several thousand dollars. The Court President was a magistrate appointed by the Government to head the tribunal composed of magistrates, military, and CDR members. The Court President led the process of asking questions directly of the defendant. There was no role for a public prosecutor, and the accused had no right to counsel. Witnesses could be called by the court or they could present themselves to give testimony. In the case of ex-President Lamizana, unsolicited witnesses testified to his genuine concern for the people. Currently there are no further trials scheduled in the people's courts, but President Sankara has said they should be viewed as a permanent feature of the country's judicial system. The traditionally independent judiciary has continued to function for criminal and civil cases. The Supreme Court, abolished in late 1983, has been replaced with two high appeals courts: one for public, and one for private, criminal and civil cases, in accordance with French judicial practice. The average citizen traditionally receives a fair trial and is represented by counsel. Still, high illiteracy in a largely rural population limits awareness of individual rights and legal benefits.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Government authorities are not known to interfere in the privacy, family, home, or correspondence of ordinary citizens. Homes may be searched under a warrant issued by the Attorney General, a procedure adhered to in practice. There is no monitoring of private correspondence or telephones. The security apparatus is not used to survey family life. While the Government encourages participation in the Committees for the Defense of the Revolution, there is no pressure on citizens to join these committees, nor discrimination against those who choose not to participate. International radio broadcasts are not jammed. A recent government practice having great impact on family life is that of arbitrary dismissal of military, civil servants, police, and teachers for primarily political reasons. These individuals must turn to the underdeveloped private sector for future gainful employment, or remain dependent on their families for the foreseeable future.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

There is no formal censorship, external or internal, in Burkina. However, in 1984 the prevailing high level of revolutionary rhetoric, with its frequent references to enemies of the state at home and abroad, undoubtedly inhibited both government-employed journalists and ordinary citizens from taking advantage of their theoretical right to express critical views. The same inhibition, further stimulated by the frequency of sudden dismissals from government service, as well as by reports of arbitrary arrests, has dampened a lively tradition of discussion on political topics.

The media in Burkina are now entirely government-owned, consisting of a daily newspaper, a weekly magazine, a daily mimeographed news bulletin, and a government-operated radio/television station. There has not been a single case of criticism of the Government in the media, which are charged with carrying official news to the people while defending the revolution. The government daily, Sidwaya, was created in April 1984. Not long afterwards, on June 10, the only independent daily, l'Observateur, went out of business when its printing plant was burned by armed intruders. The incident occurred shortly after Committees for Defense of the Revolution in Ouagadougou had denounced l'Observateur for printing an international wire service story on alleged coup-plotting. The Government subsequently denounced the burning of l'Observateur as the work of counter-revolutionary vandals. However, no official investigation of the affair has been announced. The Government maintains that the daily Sidwaya is free to print criticism and independent judgments, and denies that Sidwaya criticism of foreign governments is official in nature. Underground tracts circulated by elements critical of the Government continue to be a feature of political life, although their frequency has diminished in 1984. Foreign newspapers and magazines continue to enter the country freely. Foreign journalists and local representatives of foreign press organizations continue to travel and file stories without censorship or hindrance and enjoy easy access to Government officials up to and including the President.

There are no formal limitations on academic freedom. However, university professors and administrators have been criticized for "elitism" and dismissed for alleged counter-revolutionary tendencies. University students are now subject to political education, but still retain considerable independence. The major student organization remains dominated by a left-wing group, aligned with Albania, which regards the present regime as insufficiently revolutionary. In the arts, movies are subject to possible censorship by a review board which includes religious authorities as well as government officials.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Political parties are banned, and administrative permission is generally required for assemblies of any kind. During 1984, as the new Government consolidated its power, there was little effort by opposition groups, with the partial exception of labor unions, to organize meetings.

Labor continues to be an important feature of the political scene. Four labor federations and a number of anonymous unions exist. They range in orientation from two old-line moderate federations, traditionally unrestricted in their adversary relationship with the Government, to a much more radical federation of civil service locals. One federation is affiliated with the Brussels-based International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, a second with the World Confederation of Labor, and a third with the World Federation of Trade Unions. The civil service federation has no international affiliation.

The right to strike was restored early in 1983. In its only test thus far, the independent primary school teachers union attempted a strike in March 1984, after two of its leaders were arrested for anti-government statements. The Government charged the strike was illegally organized and politically motivated and broke it by firing the strikers. Subsequent efforts to organize a new, pro-government teachers union have apparently failed. An amnesty was extended to the fired teachers in August, but teacher union leaders remain under detention. In August, the Government cracked down on the left-wing Patriotic League for Development and dismissed the head of the radical labor federation from his government job.

Unions have continued to exercise their rights to hold conferences, train workers, and attend international congresses.

c. Freedom of Religion

Burkina Faso is a secular state, and there is no discrimination on religious grounds. Islam and Christianity exist side by side, with about 25 percent of the population Muslim and about 10 percent Christian. Both Muslim and Christian holidays are recognized as national holidays. Social mobility and access to modern sector jobs are neither linked to, nor restricted by, religious affiliations.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Freedom of movement is generally unimpeded in Burkina, although travelers are often stopped at police and internal customs check points. A strictly enforced curfew has existed throughout 1984. Foreign travel for business and tourism is not restricted. Exit permits, once required to limit movement of workers to the neighboring countries--particularly to the Ivory Coast where one million or more Burkinabe continue to reside and work--are no longer enforced. Refugees are accepted freely in Burkina and attempts are made to provide for their care in cooperation with the United Nations High Commission for Refugees. Some Ghanaians, who entered Burkina after the 1980 coup in Ghana, continue to reside in Burkina.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Since the military coup of August 1983, Burkina Faso has been ruled by President Captain Thomas Sankara in the name of the National Council for the Revolution, the composition of which has never been disclosed. There is no legislative body nor are there any recognized political opposition groups. Sankara, in the name of the National Council, appoints his Cabinet which currently consists of 21 posts, 4 held by military and the rest by civilians, including 3 women. Ministers include individuals known to be affiliated with several different and apparently antagonistic groups, such as the Union of Communist Struggle and the Patriotic League for Development.

The Government has not given any hint of plans for elections or a return to constitutional government. With political parties banned, the Government is using Committees for the Defense of the Revolution to consolidate power and to allow for a limited measure of public participation. These committees are charged with various tasks, including the surveillance of administrative affairs at the local level. In practice the Government exercises tight control over the committees and in 1984 dissolved committees which challenged national leadership.

Minority ethnic groups are as likely to be represented in the inner circles of the Government, as are the dominant Mossi who comprise 50 percent of the population. Government decisions do not favor one ethnic group over another. One announced reason for the increase in administrative regions from 11 to 30 since the August 1983 coup is to improve access of minority groups to local administrative authorities.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

During his October 4, 1984 speech before the U.N. General Assembly, President Sankara spoke in opposition to apartheid in South Africa. A government-supported organization, MOVORAP, lobbies against apartheid and other racial oppression. The Government was visibly upset by foreign criticism of its June executions, including the reported refusal of the French Socialist Party to receive a high-level

Burkinabe envoy. There has been no effort to restrict or hinder international human rights organization of A representative of the International Committee of the Red Cross visited Burkina during 1984 to investigate prison conditions. There has been no comment by Amnesty International on events in Burkina during 1984. During 1983, before Captain Sankara came to power, Amnesty expressed concern about the detention without trial of trade unionist and other senior officials of the Lamizana regime. Freedom House's 1984-85 Report rated Burkina Faso "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Burkina is overwhelmingly tied to subsistence agriculture, with 90 percent of the population living in rural areas and less than 1 percent employed in the monetized sector of the economy. Gross national product per capita was $210 in 1982. Living standards are generally higher in the few urban centers than in the countryside. Although the country suffers from recurring drought, agricultural production is gradually increasing. Meat, vegetables, and grain are available, though costly for families without their own fields and seldom plentiful in drier sections of the country. Approximately 25 percent of the population has access to safe water, with a disproportionate number of these people being in urban areas.

The general poverty of the country adversely affects the availability of social services. The literacy rate is estimated at 9 percent, with only 20 percent of school age children enrolled, 25 percent of them males and 16 percent of the females. Further, the population is growing at the rate of 2.5 percent per year as of 1984, despite an infant mortality rate of 178 deaths per 1,000 live births. Life expectancy at birth is 45 years. The primary causes of death and morbidity are malaria, and gastrointestinal, infectious, and parasitic diseases. Population pressure is somewhat ameliorated by large-scale annual migrations to neighboring countries for seasonal agricultural work.

Most of Burkina Faso's people belong to two major west African cultural groups, the Voltaic and the Mande. The Voltaic are the most numerous and include the Mossi who make up about 50 percent of the population.

The current Government has emphasized in public statements its awareness of the plight of women and its commitment to involving them in the country's economic life. Their political role has been limited, but with expanding educational opportunities women are slowly assuming a larger role in the society. The Ministry of Social Affairs works to promote greater participation by women in the nation's economic, social, and political life. Three women are ministers in the current cabinet and others have been appointed high commissioners in several provinces and magistrates in the judicial system.

BURUNDI

The Republic of Burundi is a one-party state led by President Jean-Baptiste Bagaza, an Army Colonel who came to power in 1976 through a bloodless military coup. The President is assisted in governing by the party's Central Committee and a Council of Ministers. The once dominant role of the military in government has been steadily reduced as Bagaza has steered the country toward essentially civilian governing institutions and appointed civilians to most key government positions.

The National Party for Unity and Progress is the most important political institution in Burundi. As President of the party and as head of government, Bagaza has a dominant policy role. He also exercises broad decree powers and appoints and dismisses judges. The armed forces maintain law and order, and the Government monitors dissent through the state security police. During sessions over the last two years, the National Assembly has actively debated government policy with occasional pointed criticism.

The party's second National Congress, held in 1984, confirmed President Bagaza as the party President for a five-year term. Bagaza was subsequently confirmed by the voting population of Burundi as President of the Republic. The electorate could vote only for or against him as the sole candidate.

The people of Burundi share a common language and cultural heritage but are divided into two ethnic groups. The minority Tutsi have historically dominated the majority Hutu through a quasi-feudal system of chieftainships and land ownership. The dominance continues today through control of emerging modern social, economic, and political institutions. The second republic has opened party institutions to all Burundians and appointed Hutus to all levels of government, including ministerial positions. There is no evidence of government-sanctioned discrimination against Hutus and they are not persecuted. Many Hutus who fled during the 1972 massacres are returning from their refuge in neighboring countries and reintegrating into national life.

Burundi is a very poor country with a primarily agricultural economic base and one of the highest population densities in Africa. Most Burundians earn their livelihood as subsistence farmers working small, privately owned plots. Recent gains made in food production and economic development have been largely offset by a high population growth rate.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There are no allegations of killings for political motives or of summary executions.

b. Disappearance

No instances of disappearance have been reported.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture is forbidden by law. Cruel treatment of suspects or detainees has occurred in the form of beatings at the time of arrest or interrogation. Such treatment is rare and occurs only in cases of violent crimes or resisting arrest. The Government admits that isolated instances of abuse of prisoners by prison guards or officials do occur but insists that those responsible for such abuses are punished.

Prison conditions are severe due to lack of adequate hygiene, medical care, and food. Prisoners are segregated according to the nature of their crimes, are allowed regular family visits, and participate in rehabilitative work programs. Families are permitted and expected to provide supplemental food and other personal items to their relatives in prison. The Government is making efforts to improve conditions and has cooperated with the International Committee for the Red Cross, whose contribution enabled the Government to upgrade the sanitary facilities of the central prison during 1984.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Police officers are empowered to detain suspects but must submit a written report to the public prosecutor's office within 24 hours. The public prosecutor examines the report and can either order the detainee's release or issue an arrest warrant valid for five days. Within the allotted period, the public prosecutor must formally state the charges in the presence of the detainee before a magistrate, who can release the detainee or issue orders confirming the detention, initially for 15 days and then subsequently for 30-day periods as necessary to prepare the case for trial. Bail is set only in cases of embezzlement or similar crimes involving financial wrongdoings.

The standards of arrest and imprisonment are not always upheld. The elapsed time between an arrest and the notification of the public prosecutor often extends to several days. Also, detainees do not always appear before a magistrate within the alloted five days. However, a judicial review of the arrest does take place in all cases, and arrests are made openly. Relatives or consular representatives are made aware of arrests or detentions, generally when they occur. The general practice is to permit detainees to go to their homes prior to being brought to the place of detention.

In addition to a police force responsible for civil and criminal offenses, a separate force of security police, which has primary responsibility for policing internal state security, has the same powers of arrest as the regular police and is subject to the same procedures for judicial review of detentions. During 1984 the security police detained and questioned an unknown number of persons for expression of views hostile to the Government or critical of individual members of the Government or for other activities deemed dangerous to the internal security of the nation. At least five university students were detained during 1984 for protesting a government decision to rescind scholarships. Five or six other persons, either government officials or influential private citizens, were also detained for expression of hostile views. These detainees were released within one or two months or, in one or two cases, charged with and convicted of violations of civil law.

The Government does not exile its nationals. There are cases of individuals preferring to reside outside Burundi after leaving as refugees or political opponents of the Government. Citizens of neighboring countries suspected of criminal activity and lacking proper residency documents are expelled.

The judiciary is not entirely independent. In addition to appointing judges, the President has the power to dismiss them. The judiciary is expected to adhere to the guidance and recommendations of the party, the Government and the President. Nevertheless, there is a high degree of autonomy in the day-to-day administration of justice through the courts, and due process is largely observed. Court decisions cannot be overturned by the executive branch. The President has the power to pardon or reduce sentences.

Burundi has three separate court systems to deal with civil/criminal, military, and state security cases. Military tribunals have jurisdiction only over military personnel. The state security court has jurisdiction over both civilian and military personnel and its proceedings need not be made public. To date, this court has not been used. Burundi law provides a right to counsel, and indigents are defended by the state.

Pretrial proceedings may involve lengthy investigations during which the question of guilt is virtually resolved. At the pretrial stage, the public prosecutor's office generally dismisses cases where the evidence in support of the charges is weak or unsubstantiated and only proceeds to trial when it believes guilt has been established. However, two well-known instances of not-guilty verdicts in 1984 involved a murder case and a case of high government officials accused of embezzlement.

During the past four years, the Government has taken steps to improve the judicial system. The number of local courts has almost doubled. New provincial courts have been created, the number of magistrates has tripled, and training seminars and conferences have been held. The functioning of the system is still hampered by the lack of trained legal personnel and the heavy case loads. The 1984 party congress recommended additional reforms in the judicial system, which include giving priority to cases where the accused is in preventive detention.

There are no verified cases of purely political prisoners, although one or two such cases have been alleged. Defamation of a public figure is a civil offense and several persons are serving short sentences (under 12 months) after convictions for this offense. There are also two or three prisoners who were initially detained for political activities hostile to the Government but who were subsequently charged with and convicted of corrupt practices or embezzlement of public funds. The ICRC does not consider a program of visitation to such prisoners necessary in Burundi.

f. Arbitrary Interference With Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The right to privacy of correspondence and the inviolability of the home are guaranteed in the Constitution. A judicial warrant is required for a law enforcement official to enter and search a private residence. There are no reports of violations.

Citizens are not coerced to become members of any organization. Membership in the political party and its affiliated organizations is open to all but not required. However, the Government requires that all citizens perform community work on Saturday morning and this has created a conflict with at least one religious group. The state security office does monitor dissent through officers of the state security police and paid informers who report on discontent and dissension as well as criminal activity. The security system is concerned primarily with potential violence against the Government.

Section 2 Respect For Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Government controls all domestic print and broadcast media. The French language daily and Kirundi language weekly are published by the Ministry of Information, which also operates the domestic radio stations. The media are required to support the fundamental policies of the party and Government. Some criticism of government mismanagement and secondary aspects of policies is permitted in the printed press but not on radio. Journalists are state employees and as such would be subject to disciplinary action if their criticism went beyond what is considered tolerable. The Government does not interfere with the distribution of foreign news publications nor with radio reception from foreign sources.

Freedom of speech is limited by statute. Criticism of the party and government policies or leadership is permitted only within party meetings. Academic freedom is also limited. At the primary and secondary school level, teachers are expected to support government policies. At the university, professors come from several different countries and are permitted to lecture freely in their subject areas, conduct research, and draw independent conclusions. Censorship occurs only in the case of sexually explicit foreign film material or publications.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The express authorization of the Government is required for all political meetings or speakers. This effectively guarantees government control of all public fora and limits association for political purposes to participation in the party or its affiliated youth, labor, or women's movements.

The party controls the trade union confederation called the National Labor Union or UTB. The principal roles of the UTB, to which virtually the entire salaried work force belongs, are to educate its rank and file regarding their legal protections and serve as a mediator between workers and employers. The right to strike is denied in practice, and individual advocacy of a strike or lock-out is a criminal offense. The UTB maintains links with international labor bodies. The UTB participates in the International Labor Organization (ILO) and is a member of the continent-wide Organization of African Trade Union Unity (OATUU) based in Accra.

In 1983, Burundi was cited by the ILO in Geneva for violations of ILO conventions 20 and 105 pertaining to forced labor, because of legislation imposing compulsory cultivation on Burundi farmers under the threat of penal sanctions. The Burundi Government, however, maintains that the legislation referred to by the ILO citation is no longer in use and that it is initiating a general study to remove from the books similar laws which are no longer relevant under the Burundi Constitution.

The Government permits nonpolitical private associations, but requires that they be registered and accorded legal recognition before they may function.

c. Freedom of Religion

Although Burundi is a secular state, religious freedoms are restricted by the Government. All religious associations must receive approval from the Government, and government authorities must be informed in advance of religious gatherings. Such gatherings are strictly limited to recognized places of worship (i.e., churches, mosques, and temples), and religious services are authorized only after midday on Saturday and on Sundays. (In spite of this order, the Government does not interfere with Muslim worship on Fridays.)

The Jehovah's Witnesses sect is banned because its doctrine challenges certain precepts of civil authority. The sect does not have legal status in Burundi and consequently cannot openly carry out activities within the faith or aimed at conversion. Terms of imprisonment for Jehovah's Witnesses activists are generally less than the maximum six-month penalty. There are no reports of persons imprisoned for merely adhering to the sect. The Seventh Day Adventists' activities in Burundi were curtailed during 1984. The Adventists, who regard Saturday as the Sabbath, came into conflict with the Government over the issue of community work, which is normally required of all citizens on Saturday, and the right to hold services on Saturday morning. The Adventists' refusal to perform work of any kind on their Sabbath led to the closing of Adventist churches and loss of their legal status. Other churches have suffered various harassments. The Government has made it clear that churches are to confine their activities to religion and social works and stay out of political matters, which include Hutu/Tutsi relations. The churches have been forbidden to hold weekday services; religious symbols not actually on church buildings have been removed by local authorities; and 15-20 missionaries have been expelled over the past year. No reasons were given by the Government for the expulsions.

Church access to the media is curtailed with the longstanding suspension of a Catholic newspaper and of religious radio broadcasts. There are, however, no barriers to the training of the clergy or to maintenance of links with religious hierarchies or groups in other countries. Also, the Government does not prevent the arrival of new missionaries. Religious beliefs do not exclude individuals from political participation or social benefits.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Movement is generally free within Burundi, although government policies discourage urban migration. There is no system of internal pass controls or curfew. Foreign travel and emigration are relatively free. However, the Government requires exit visas as well as passports. The Government has occasionally withheld these documents without explanation but apparently for political motivations. Burundi's refugee and asylum practices are humane and cooperation with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees is close. The country's estimated 70,000 refugees, primarily Tutsis of Rwandan origin who fled to Burundi in the 1960's, have mostly been settled, although they are not very often granted citizenship. Refugees who fled Burundi in the early 1970's and before continue to return in increasing numbers and have full rights as citizens. Amnesty International has been concerned about the situation of refugees and asylum seekers from Zaire. Several were allegedly forcibly repatriated in 1983.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The citizens of Burundi do not have the right under the existing political system to change their Government. Political participation can take place only within the one-party structure, and voters can express dissatisfaction only by sending incumbents down to defeat. The President of the party is the sole candidate for President of the Republic. Power rests with the President, Jean-Baptiste Bagaza, and with the party Central Committee. The party is open to all Burundians who profess allegiance to its principles and claims membership of about 1.4 million, about three-quarters of the adult population. The party regularly holds congresses at the local and regional levels, during which members can discuss issues and make recommendations. While there are multiple candidates for party positions, balloting is not secret. The party's National Congress met during July 1984 and was attended by approximately 900 delegates, including pre-selected delegates from the party's affiliated youth, labor, and women's movements, and from the armed forces.

The National Congress selected a new Central Committee and reelected Bagaza as president. He was subsequently confirmed as President of Burundi on August 31, 1984, for a five-year term, receiving 99.6 percent of the votes. Although the process cannot be considered an election, it did mark the first time that the population of Burundi has had any role whatsoever to play in the approval of their Chief of State.

The Constitution provides for a national assembly, which came into being in 1982 with a five-year mandate. Fifty-two of the 65 representatives are voted for by secret ballot under universal adult suffrage and the remainder are appointed by the President. All candidates are drawn from a list preselected by provincial electoral colleges composed of party and government officials. Two candidates for each elective seat were permitted. The balloting was evidently free, as several high party and government officials failed to win seats. The Assembly is not intended to be a separate and independent power but is expected to cooperate with and complement the other institutions. Nevertheless, its recent proceedings in enacting legislation and approving budgets indicate that it has the potential to evolve into an active institutional participant in the process of government.

Although the military remains influential and is still represented in all the party organs and in the Government, its role in government administration had declined markedly since 1979 when the military Supreme Revolutionary Council, which had ruled the country since 1976, was dissolved. Only 3 military officers are currently cabinet members, and military officers hold 12 of the 69 Central Committee seats.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Burundi is a party to several United Nations instruments on human rights and its Constitution provides for the protection of such rights. There were no reports during 1984 of requests for outside investigations of alleged human rights violations. The last visit of the ICRC took place in late 1983. The Government complied with the ICRC's standard conditions for visits to prisoners or detainees. In 1984, in addition to the status of Zairian refugees, Amnesty International was concerned by the restrictions imposed on religious activities and the detentions of members of religious groups. Freedom House terms Burundi "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Burundi is among the poorest countries of the world, with a 1982 per capita gross national product of $280. Fifty-five percent of the urban population and 85 percent of the rural population is below the absolute poverty level (1978). Population density is one of the highest in Africa, with a population of 4.663 million (1984) inhabiting a land area of only 27,834 square kilometers. The population growth rate for 1984 is estimated at 2.6 percent. Nearly 95 percent of Burundians earn their livelihood from agriculture. The traditional feudal land tenure system has been abolished, and most individual farmers own the land they cultivate. Food production has not increased as rapidly as the population. Calorie supply as a percentage of requirements was estimated at 96.74 (1977). The Government has adopted a voluntary comprehensive family planning policy and emphasized agriculture in its most recent five-year plan (1983-87).

Burundi's relatively small monetary economy is based on the export of coffee, which accounts for 90 percent of foreign exchange earnings. The economy has been hit hard by the decline in world coffee prices since 1979, sharply rising energy costs, and high transportation costs. Real economic growth over the past five years has stayed only slightly ahead of population growth.

Health care is inadequate as Burundi suffers from a shortage of personnel, facilities, and budgetary resources. Life expectancy at birth is only 47.43 years (1984), and the rate of infant mortality is 116.8 per 1,000 live births (1984). Although most urban dwellers have access to potable water supplies, the percentage of the rural population with access to safe year-round water is very low. Educational opportunities, despite considerable government efforts supported by donor assistance, remain below the needs of the population. Only 26.8 percent of adults are literate according to 1980 figures (38.9 male, 15.4 female). World Bank statistics for 1981 show primary school enrollment of 31.12 percent of the primary school age population (38.71 percent for males, 23.69 percent for females.) Only a small fraction of those completing primary school can obtain places in the nation's 35 secondary schools. An even smaller percentage of students win places in the nation's sole university.

BURUNDI

The minority Tutsi, traditionally a pastoral people, have for centuries dominated the majority Hutu, traditionally a farming people. The government-sanctioned massacres in 1972 led to nearly 200,000 Hutus fleeing to neighboring Rwanda and Tanzania. Since 1976, with the advent of the second republic, the degree of ethnic tension has been markedly reduced. Thousands of Hutu refugees have returned to Burundi. Intermarriage has also contributed to a blurring of ethnic distinctions. The low level of economic development in rural areas affects both Tutsi and Hutu, with differences in economic status between the two groups generally not discernible in the countryside. However, because of their longstanding dominance of the Government and access to education, the Tutsi predominate in the modern sector. The military remains under Tutsi control. While there is social and cultural discrimination, there is no evidence that Hutus are denied equal protection of the law.

Women in society hold a secondary position, although their status is undergoing considerable change from traditional patterns. The Constitution provides for legal equality, and significant improvement in the legal status of women came in 1980 with the issuance of a new legal code on families. This code prohibits polygamy and use of dowry, and allows women control of family matters in the absence of the husband. Women, however, still cannot inherit land and cannot work if forbidden to by their husbands. Although fewer women than men attain an education, once it is attained women can generally find suitable employment. The Government does not discriminate against women in hiring or in respect to the jobs which are open to them. Women are represented at all levels in the political life of the country. However, their main vehicle of political expression is the women's movement affiliated with the party. The party remains dominated by males.

CAMEROON

Political power in Cameroon is concentrated in the presidency. The President makes all major decisions and appoints all important governmental and party officials. Cameroon had an active multi-party system at the time of its independence; under former president Ahidjo all parties were gradually consolidated into the Cameroon National Union. Although Cameroon's 1972 Constitution provides for a democratic, multi-party system, in actuality the sole political party also selects candidates for public office, who run unopposed. In the 1984 Presidential elections President Biya officially received 99.98 percent of the votes cast.

Cameroon's political system is in part a product of the country's ethnic and linguistic diversity, encompassing some 200 different ethnic groups with over 230 separate languages, as well as three colonial heritages (French, British, and German). During the 22 years of President Ahidjo's rule, the diversity and armed violence in some parts of the country were used to justify authoritarian control and harsh restrictions on civil liberties. The Ahidjo legacy still shapes President Biya's policies, despite the steps he has taken to liberalize the political system. Cameroon's economy continues to thrive, and its per capita income ranks Cameroon among the middle income developing countries, even though it remains plagued by many problems of underdevelopment. Growth, propelled by oil revenues, continues at a steady pace.

In 1984, the human rights environment in Cameroon was influenced by the Biya Government's continuing concern about former President Ahidjo and his supporters and the relaxing of some controls on freedom of expression and political participation.

Ahidjo and two former aides were tried in February on charges of conspiracy to assassinate President Biya and to overthrow the Government. All three were found guilty (Ahidjo in absentia) and sentenced to death, but the sentences were later commuted to life imprisonment.

In April members of the presidential security force who were still loyal to Ahidjo staged an unsuccessful coup. From 200 to possibly as many as a thousand soldiers and civilians were killed before government troops regained control. During a November 15 press conference, President Biya said that 1,205 people had been detained, and 491 had been prosecuted, of whom 232 were acquitted, 205 sentenced to prison terms, and 54 condemned to death (including three who had been listed earlier as sentenced to death, in absentia). Charges in absentia against one other person were dropped because he had died from wounds suffered in the coup attempt. These figures appear to be substantially correct. A state of emergency was declared April 18 for the Yaounde area; in addition, a continuing state of emergency has been in effect in some parts of Cameroon since the crushing of a violent uprising by the opposition Union des Populations Camerounaises, in the late 1950s and early 1960s. Internal travel was subjected to close surveillance throughout the country, and there were numerous arrests and searches without warrants. Foreign diplomats were often stopped and searched.

Despite the above, the Biya Government stated on various occasions its desire to press ahead with "democratization." Press controls were loosened during the course of the year, and several private newspapers were started. Several employees of a prominent English language newspaper were arrested, and later released, for publishing articles overly critical of senior politicians. Party debates on government policy also were more open than they had been previously, and Cameroonians in general were less inhibited in discussing political issues. Fifteen political prisoners (including one cited in Amnesty International's 1983 report) were released in January. As of October 1984, there were estimated to be fewer than 10 political prisoners still in custody.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no confirmed reports of political killing during 1984. Amnesty International cited allegations that loyalist troops summarily executed some people they suspected of involvement in the coup, but it has not been possible to confirm these reports. There is no confirmation of the murder of any civilians by the rebels, although a prominent businessman was murdered during the coup attempt by persons whom the Government reported to be rebels.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of the disappearance of individuals in Cameroon during 1984.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture is proscribed implicitly in the Constitution. Cameroon's criminal procedures provide that evidence obtained by torture is inadmissable. In addition, the penal code prohibits public servants from using force against any person. However, there were credible reports during 1984 of ill treatment, such as beatings, during police interrogation and imprisonment. Amnesty International has also reported allegations of harsh prison conditions and ill treatment of detainees.

Persons under "administrative detention" (i.e., political prisoners) are kept in special camps or prisons. In former times, some of these prisoners were confined in totally dark cells for long periods of time. It has not been possible to confirm whether this practice continues. Access to the "administrative detention" centers by families and friends is reported to be severely restricted.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Under Cameroonian law a person arrested on suspicion of committing an offense may not be held for more than 48 hours without a court order, and this provision is generally observed in non-political cases. However, after an investigating magistrate has determined that the case should be brought to trial and has issued a warrant to this effect, there is no limitation on how long the person charged may be held in "preventive detention" pending trial. Accused persons awaiting trial constitute the great majority of persons in the prisons at Yaounde and Douala. Release on bail is infrequent. Other legal provisions are sometimes used to obtain the release of persons detained illegally.

Citizens continue to be stopped by local police who harass or threaten to detain them unless a bribe is paid, but for the most part those detained are released within 24 hours. These actions are not initiated or condoned by high government officials and have been sharply criticized by the President.

Persons may be held in "administrative detention" under legislation pertaining to subversion. Such detention by regional authorities is initally for one month, renewable twice, and may be extended up to an additional six months by the Minister of Territorial Administration.

Generally, those arrested and placed in administrative detention do not disappear--their families are told where they are and they are eventually released, although the detention may be a long one. President Biya released 15 such prisoners on January 21 as part of a general remission of sentences. The Government is also reported to have released in June four asylum seekers from neighboring countries, who had been held in administrative detention since 1982. As of October 1984, there were estimated to be fewer than 10 prisoners still under "administrative detention."

Under the state of emergency which exists in Yaounde and portions of three provinces, authorities may also order detention for up to one week for persons judged "dangerous to public security." The Minister of Territorial Administration may also order detention of such persons for up to two months; the order is renewable without limitation. This provision also provided additional license for the police, the gendarmes, and the army to harass or detain anyone whose papers were not in order, who was suspected of being a mercenary, or otherwise seemed suspicious. These detentions involved both Cameroonians and foreigners (including 14 Americans), but generally lasted only overnight. The exact number of such short-term detentions is not known, but the total is believed to be at least several hundred and possibly in the thousands.

The Government announced in May that 1,053 persons had been arrested and detained at length during the state of emergency; by November that official figure increased to 1,205. An additional group of about 52 accused were either tried or released without trial in November and December, but at year's end it was not clear what sentences had been handed down, or how many more suspects remained in custody. One source says that no one was sentenced to death.

There are an unknown number of former members of the outlawed Union Des Populations Camerounaises party in self-imposed exile. The Government has held discussions with some of those who desire to return, and there have been reliable reports that a few have returned.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Trial by a presiding magistrate is guaranteed by law, and this practice is followed with the exception of individuals held under administrative detention. Public trials are also guaranteed by law, although exceptions for the public good or national security are allowed, and trials which involve prominent persons or which are controversial sometimes do take place in camera. Magistrates in Cameroon are drawn from a corps of career civil servants who must possess law degrees. They are generally free from government interference and are considered to conduct fair trials. Defendants in felony cases are provided attorneys if they cannot afford to engage their own.

Former President Ahidjo was tried in absentia along with military officers Ibrahim Oumarou and Adamou Salatou by a military tribunal as mandated by the 1972 military procedures code. An attorney representing Ahidjo was present on the opening day of the trial, but declined to take part because of the absence of his client. Court appointed attorneys were also present to represent Salatou and Oumarou, but they declined representation. Observers from international human rights organizations were present throughout the trial, including at one session in camera. Amnesty International expressed two concerns about the trial: the lack of the right to appeal the decision, and the lack of investigation of allegations that Salatou and Oumarou had been tortured in pre-trial custody.

Those accused of involvement in the coup attempt were also tried before a military tribunal, but all of the trials were closed to the public. A court-appointed counsel was available to defendants if they wished, although in some cases there was little time for that attorney to prepare a defense. According to a government statement released November 15, 491 people had been tried, of whom 232 were acquitted, 205 were sentenced to prison terms and 54 were sentenced to death (three in absentia). About 52 others were tried or released without trial in November and December. It is believed that about 45 people have actually been executed, although Amnesty International reported in August that "well-informed sources have given the total number of such executions at over 120."

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Both invasion of the home and tampering with correspondence are violations of Cameroonian law. There are reports that police do enter homes without warrants, however, during periodic searches for criminals in the lower income neighborhoods. After the April 1984 coup attempt, there also were reports of government scrutiny of private correspondence, primarily of letters and pamphlets entering the country from external dissident groups, and monitoring of telephone calls. Although membership in the country's sole political party, the Cameroon National Union, is not mandatory, there have been credible reports that zealous local party officials have denied routine services, such as a driver's license, to persons who do not possess party cards. The Government does not condone such actions.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Although the Constitution of 1972 guarantees the freedoms of expression and press, under Cameroonian law and practice, these freedoms are restricted. However, 1984 saw the restrictions loosened somewhat. Independent newspapers proliferated, including 24 registered as "general information" papers. These newspapers regularly print criticism of government programs for education, development, or censorship, and also print occasional articles on security issues. There are still many taboo subjects, however, and two journalists were detained for three days after having written an article critical of a high government official. Another journalist was arrested and held for five days, and his newspaper temporarily closed, for publication of criticism of police corruption. In addition, Blaise Pascal Talla, a Cameroonian businessman affiliated with the weekly magazine "Jeune Afrique," was arrested in November for illegal possession of arms and ammunition. He is not a reporter, and the arrest does not appear to be related to his duties with the magazine.

There has also been a continued increase in the amount of comment on internal politics in the government-controlled press and radio, although the Government affords official journalists much less latitude than it does their private counterparts. Most official journalists are civil servants, and if they are not sufficiently careful in their self-censorship, they can be transferred to less desirable jobs. Senior government officials recently instructed private journalists on their responsibility to represent the views of the Government.

International magazines are now permitted, with a few exceptions, on the newsstands. The government-controlled Cameroon Tribune also now carries summaries of these foreign articles on Cameroon.

Informal political discussion appeared more open in 1984 than in recent years, and the threat of surveillance and detention for the expression of political views diminished. Government restrictions on university lecture content and publications continue to decrease, but the Government continues to react firmly to any signs of student protest. In August, security forces rounded up a large number of students (probably several hundred) at the University of Yaounde. Most were quickly released, but about 10 were accused of accepting money from Ahidjo supporters to distribute anti-government tracts, and held for several weeks.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of assembly and association, while guaranteed in the Constitution, are restricted in practice and in law. The Cameroonian Penal Code prohibits public meetings, demonstrations, or processions without prior government approval, and organizations must register with the Government.

The sole union, the National Union of Cameroon Workers, operates within the framework of the official party, the Cameroon National Union, and top union leadership is chosen by the Government. The labor union does not play a major role in Cameroon's political life, although it has a membership of approximately 450,000 workers in a working population of more than three million. It pursues individual worker grievances and seeks improvements in government programs for worker safety and training.

The union participates in a government-regulated negotiation process with employers, but strikes are illegal. Political activity by the trade union, outside of actions designed to protect economic and other interests, is prohibited. The union cannot have contact with foreign trade union organizations without government authorization. Cameroon is a member of the International Labor Organization, and union members comprise part of the Cameroonian delegation to its meetings. The union is also a member of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity.

c. Freedom of Religion

Cameroon is comprised roughly of 20 percent Muslims, 30 percent Christians, and the rest animists. Freedom of religion is guaranteed in the Constitution and is generally respected. Officials of the Government and party are drawn from members of all denominations. Missionaries have played a major role in the development of Cameroon since the 19th century. However, members of religious groups such as Jehovah's Witnesses, who do not acknowledge the supremacy of the state, have been arrested for failure to comply with laws requiring registration of all organizations including religious groups. Acts of witchcraft, magic, or divination liable to disrupt public order or tranquility or to harm person or property are outlawed with penalties of up to 10 years imprisonment.

d. Freedom of Movement within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Freedom of movement within the country is not restricted by law. In practice, however, police frequently stop travelers for a check of identification, tax receipts, or voting cards. The increased use of roadblocks by police, gendarmes, and the military since the coup attempt sometimes leads to incidents of petty harassment or detention. Exit visas are required to leave the country and sometimes are available only after long bureaucratic delays. In some cases, these delays may represent attempts by the Government to discourage or even prevent departure. The Government has also been known to refuse issuance of a passport, or to confiscate a passport already issued, in order to prevent someone from traveling abroad. Cameroonians leaving the country must deposit sums sufficient to buy a return air ticket for repatriation should they become stranded abroad. There are no restrictions on the right of voluntary repatriation. Women must obtain the permission of their husbands or fathers to leave the country.

Over the years, Cameroon has served as a safehaven for hundreds of thousands of displaced persons from neighboring countries as well as from countries as far away as South Africa. Chadians who have fled to Cameroon currently number between 15,000 and 25,000; displaced persons from South Africa, Zaire, and Angola are also currently residing in Cameroon.

Many of the displaced persons now in Cameroon entered the country illegally, and are not registered officially as refugees. In some instances, they are living and working with members of the same tribe in Cameroon; in other instances, entire villages have moved across the border from Chad into Cameroon. If they are employed, and pay into the official benefit system, they are eligible for the same social and government benefits as Cameroonian citizens. There have been some reports of exploitation of Chadians who have entered Cameroon illegally by business representatives who pay them less than the going wage. Those displaced Chadians legally in Cameroon are sent to the Poli refugee camp, where they receive medical care and services comparable to those received by Cameroonians. The Chadians at Poli have established farms; there have been no reports of discrimination. A number of other displaced persons, including Namibians, are in Cameroon as students. There is a reliable report that in mid-1982 the Cameroonian Government arrested a total of five asylum seekers from nearby African countries and held them in administrative detention as "subversives." According to the same report, one detainee was released in 1983 and the others in 1984, and no others are being held.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Cameroon continues to be a one-party state ruled by the President, with a minimal role played by the electorate. Following the resignation of former President Ahidjo on November 4, 1982, his constitutional successor, Prime Minister Paul Biya, took office as President. In September 1983 Biya was elected President of the party, following Ahidjo's resignation from that office. While the Constitution implies the legality of other political parties, in fact, only one party is permitted--the Cameroon National Union. A recent revision in the election law now permits in theory multiple candidates for the presidency. In the January 1984 elections President Biya ran unopposed and received 99.98 percent of the votes.

Membership in the Cameroon National Union party is open to all religious and ethnic groups, but the party remains a centrally controlled organization. The party elite chooses the candidates for local offices as well as for the National Assembly. One candidate is chosen for each position by the party and submitted to the electorate. The electorate has not rejected a candidate chosen by the party since the Cameroon National Union was constituted the sole legal party in 1966. There was a minor modification of this policy during the 1983 legislative elections when local party officials were given a larger role in the selection of nominees, and during 1984 there has been a gradual opening up of debate within the party, but the party elite still makes all major decisions.

Two externally based dissident groups, the Union des Populations Camerounaises (Francophone) and the Cameroon Action Movement (Anglophone), periodically send letters or pamphlets into the country. The Government generally succeeds in seizing these documents when they arrive.

Governors, prefects, and cabinet ministers in Cameroon are appointed by the President. The National Assembly plays no role in these appointments. Local officials, such as mayors and community councils, are elected, but the single candidate for each position is selected by the party elite. Voter participation is strongly encouraged by the Government. Although there is no law which requires individuals to vote, local police periodically stop motorists on election day to demand their voting cards, and those not possessing such cards on occasion have been detained temporarily or otherwise harassed.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Cameroonian Constitution affirms support for the freedoms guaranteed in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the United Nations Charter. Under President Biya the Government has greatly increased the attention it pays to human rights issues, both internally as a part of Biya's program of "democratization" and in public statements at international forums such as the United Nations. On June 27, Cameroon acceded to the United Nations International Covenants on Civil and Political Rights, and on Economic, Social, and Cultural Rights. Cameroon hosted the fourth African seminar on international human rights in December 1983, and in February allowed observers from the Human Rights League, the Association of African Jurists, and Pax Romanus to attend the Ahidjo trial. After the April 6 coup attempt, government and private opinion in Cameroon held that the Government had gone to extraordinary lengths to protect the civil rights of the alleged coup plotters and to give them a fair trial.

When Amnesty International sent a telex to President Biya alleging that Cameroon had conducted arbitrary arrests and torture, and up to 120 secret executions following the coup attempt, the Government responded with a public denial of the charges and strongly criticized Amnesty. In a later report released August 17, Amnesty International called upon the Government of Cameroon: to commute all court-imposed death sentences which had not yet been carried out; to release the names of all those convicted of offenses arising from the April 6, 1984 coup attempt and the details of the charges against them; to make public details of the proceedings of the military tribunals used to hear cases against people detained after the coup attempt; to institute a right of appeal before an impartial tribunal for all prisoners convicted of offenses arising from the coup attempt; and to disclose the number of executions which had been carried out since April 6, 1984, with the names of the victims, together with the offenses for which they were convicted. The Government has not publicly replied to those requests. Freedom House lists Cameroon as "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Cameroon has one of the strongest economies among African developing countries, recently averaging a seven percent growth rate due primarily to oil revenues and its relatively well balanced, market-oriented economy and prudent economic policy management. Political events during 1984, including the Government's anti-corruption campaign, contributed to some commercial sector slowdown, and drought has affected agricultural production, but activity in both sectors has picked up more recently. The GNP per capita ($883.30 in 1982) is poorly distributed among the population. The rate of inflation is officially estimated at 15 percent, but is probably higher.

Cameroon's population is approximately 9.5 million, and is growing at a rate of some 2.7 percent per year. Over 60 percent of the people still live in rural areas, but the urban population is expanding by 8 percent a year. In 1978, 15 percent of the urban population and 40 percent of the rural population were estimated to live below the absolute poverty level. The rapid growth in urban population has produced an increased need for basic urban infrastructure, and also means that continuing productivity increases in food crop agriculture are necessary if Cameroon is to continue to produce the major part of its food requirements in rural areas. Many of those living below the poverty level are subsistence farmers.

CAMEROON

The average Cameroonian has a life expectancy of 53 years. Nationally, the infant mortality rate is 136 per 1,000 live births. Chronic undernutrition affects 21 percent of the children under age five. Despite this figure, the ratio of calorie supply available for consumption relative to nutritional requirements was 102 percent in 1981. Such practices as early weaning, as well as intestinal parasites and diarrhea, have contributed to infant and child malnutrition, despite the surplus of calories available. Malnutrition is more prevalent in rural areas. Based on a 1976 estimate, some 26 percent of the population is estimated to have access to safe drinking water; the figure for urban dwellers is 35 percent and for rural inhabitants 22 percent.

The school enrollment rate for children between the ages of 6 and 14 averages 88 percent in urban areas and 46 percent in rural areas, with female students underrepresented noticeably in the rural secondary schools. In 1981 at the primary school level there were slightly more boys than girls attending school (117 percent as compared with 97 percent between 6 and 11). Above 15 years of age, the number of boys attending school is practically double that of girls (29.8 percent of boys as compared with 14.6 percent of girls between the ages of 15 and 24). In 1981, there was a primary school enrollment ratio of 107 percent of those available to attend. The excess over 100 percent is due to enrollment of students over the expected age of primary students. School attendance rates are one-third the national average in the Muslim north, where only 22 percent of the children attend school. The national adult literacy rate is estimated to be 14 percent.

Girls are differentially underprivileged as regards access to school and subsequent performance. Girls from the southern part of the country, although disadvantaged at the level of secondary entrance when compared with boys from the same areas, have a considerable educational lead over both girls and boys from the eastern and northern provinces. In 1979, less than one-quarter of primary pupils in the northern provinces were girls as contrasted with 44-47 percent in the littoral, western, and center-south provinces, where the high levels of enrollment reflect the influence of the Christian religion and education since the late 19th century and the corresponding incorporation of those areas under colonialism.

Women enjoy equal rights with men under the Constitution and are politically active in the party and labor union. The women's wing of the party has created social and educational programs aimed at encouraging the economic and social productivity of Cameroonian women. Women are represented in the modern sector, although not proportionately in the upper levels of administration and in the professions.
There are currently five women in President Biya's cabinet, two ministers and three vice ministers. However, there are no women governors or prefects, both presidentially appointed positions. Women also hold positions as ambassador to Spain, and members of the National Assembly. As a result of the 1983 legislative elections, the percentage of women in the National Assembly increased from 10 percent to 14 percent.

CAPE VERDE

Cape Verde is ruled by the African Party for the Independence of Cape Verde, the country's sole political party. Government ministers, in most cases, are also senior members of the party. Many of them are former leaders of the revolutionary movement to free Cape Verde from Portuguese rule. This party leadership, headed by President Pereira, in effect rules the country. Party membership has about doubled in the nine years since independence, and the leadership group has been expanded to include technocrats whose revolutionary credentials are less strong. Still, only about five percent of the voting population belongs to the party, although it is officially open to anyone wishing to join.

The Constitution adopted in 1980 declares the party "the supreme expression of the interests of the popular masses" and designates the Popular National Assembly as the supreme organ of the state. The designation of the party as the country's governing political organization and the control of the party apparatus by senior members effectively limits the permissible range of political activity. The Assembly selects the President, who, as head of state, proposes the prime minister to the Assembly. The Assembly is elected from a slate of candidates which is proposed to the electorate by the party. Party selection of all candidates for Assembly seats restricts the freedom of choice of the individual voter.

Security responsibilities are divided between the army, primarily for external defense, and the security and police forces for internal order. Both operate under legal guidelines and leadership approved by the party.

Although Cape Verde is one of the poorest nations in the world, sizable amounts of foreign assistance, as well as remittances from Cape Verdean emigrants, prevent starvation. The current drought, now in its 17th year, drastically limits production of even basic necessities. The duration of the drought has reduced irrigated areas by about one-half and seriously diminished water supplies for domestic and industrial use. As three-quarters of the population is rural with few employment opportunities apart from farming, Cape Verdeans continue to emigrate on a major scale.

The Government, which is the largest nonagricultural employer, also controls banking, the import of basic commodities, airlines, the press, and schools. Private property rights are respected, and there is a substantial private sector which includes shops, hotels, farms, fishing, small industries such as tuna canning, and the professions.

The state of human rights in Cape Verde during 1984 changed little from that of 1983. Opposition groups outside the country continued to make allegations that dissent was suppressed by the Government. There were no reports of political killings, disappearances, torture, or arbitrary arrest.

CAPE VERDE

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

During 1984 there were no reported instances of politically motivated deaths.

b. Disappearance

During 1984 there were no reported instances of officially inspired disappearances.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Although there is no evidence of torture and cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment being used in any generalized manner, groups of Cape Verdean emigres from time to time allege that one or another of these activities takes place. Instances of beating during interrogation by security officers cannot be ruled out. Stories of torture or degrading treatment of those arrested in the 1981 demonstrations against agrarian reform (all of whom have been released) are still circulated by groups outside the country and, although these stories could not be confirmed, they may have had some validity. The Government denied them at the time but no longer reacts to the reiteration of old charges.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

During 1984 there were no reported instances of people being detained, punished, or tried for the expression of views critical of or different from those of the Government. Habeas corpus exists in Cape Verde and appears to be observed for non-political offenses. Cape Verde law requires that those arrested be charged within 48 hours. In exceptional cases, and then with the concurrence of a procurator or judge, the formal charge process may be slightly delayed but must take place within five days. However, in cases of alleged crimes against state security, persons may be detained for up to five months without trial upon a judge's ruling. There is a functioning system of bail, and the right of access to a lawyer seems to be observed in practice. During 1984 there were no known political prisoners held in Cape Verde and no instances of forced exile for political or other reasons.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Unless caught in the act, an accused must be brought before a judge within 48 hours of arrest to hear evidence from the prosecutor who would prefer charges. Counsel is supposed to be present for the accused who then may be held in custody, released on bail, or released unconditionally. Trials are conducted by one judge; a public prosecutor presents the case against an accused, who is defended by counsel. There is no jury system. Appeal is possible. Trials appear to be handled expeditiously. There is also a system of popular tribunals to adjudicate minor disputes on a neighborhood or local level in rural areas. The "judges" are usually prominent local citizens without legal training, who are appointees of the Ministry of Justice. Their decisions can be appealed within the regular court system.

The judiciary does not have the authority to determine the constitutionality of legislation. Although, according to the Constitution, judges are independent, one former judge now living outside the country has claimed that one-party rule in practice has hampered the functioning of a truly independent judiciary. Most evidence suggests, however, that the courts protect individual rights in criminal cases.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution recognizes citizens' rights to the inviolability of domicile, correspondence, and other private means of communication. In the case of a domicile, the law requires search warrants issued by a judge. There were no known cases of arbitrary interference with privacy, family, home, or correspondence during 1984. The Constitution also contains the provision that every citizen has the right and the duty to participate in the political, economic, and cultural life of the country. This provision theoretically could be used to force participation in activities against an individual's will. However, in practice, there is no evidence to suggest it is being done.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and intellectual creativity, including the rights of authorship, are proclaimed in the Constitution. The Constitution also stipulates, however, that none of the rights and freedoms may be exercised "contrary to national unity," and it institutionalizes the party's political leadership. Moreover, freedom of the press is not a specific constitutional guarantee. The weekly newspaper and radio are government owned, and follow government policies. Although occasional articles critical of some aspects of government policy are printed or broadcast, this is probably done with prior authorization. International periodicals generally circulate freely in Cape Verde, even when they carry articles critical of or unflattering to the Government, as is frequently the case with Portuguese newspapers. International radio broadcasts are received clearly without interference. Censorship of movies is practiced, although it is not known if the criteria are political or primarily to protect public morals. Local radio broadcasts carry items from Western agencies as well as from Communist countries, generally identifying sources on controversial international issues and balancing off, for example, Tass reports with others from Western sources. It is unlikely that establishment of print or other media enterprises not subject to government control would be permitted.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The freedom to meet, to associate freely, and to demonstrate is guaranteed in the Constitution. However, as a practical matter, no organizations antithetical to government actions or policies would be permitted. Private associations other than sports clubs or religious youth groups do not exist and would have to be authorized. Party-sponsored "mass organizations" of women and youth are prominent, however.

Workers in several sectors are organized into unions within the national union structure which is affiliated to the sole political party and is headed by a high-ranking member of the party. Although the national union confederation claims to be independent of the party, the two are closely tied. Individual unions perform some traditional trade union functions and act also as party affiliates. The right to strike is guaranteed but is rarely used, even though union leadership has taken positions on specific issues opposed to government policies in state enterprises. The national union confederation participates in the International Labor Organization and is affiliated to the Organization of African Trade Union Unity, but has not taken positions independent of those officially sanctioned by the Government. It maintains contact with and receives assistance from both Communist and non-Communist national unions abroad.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Constitution separates church and state. Freedom of worship is respected by the Government, and members of all faiths practice their religion without harassment. Two-thirds or more of the population, probably including most of the government leadership, are nominally Catholic but the dominance of Catholicism does not appear to affect adversely other faiths. Evangelical Protestants and Seventh-Day Adventists are the two other principal religious communities. There are no restrictions on religious practices, teaching, or contacts with coreligionists outside Cape Verde. A few foreign missionaries and foreign members of the clergy are active in Cape Verde.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no extraordinary legal or administrative restrictions on either travel or residence within the country. However, all resident Cape Verdeans wishing to leave the country, either temporarily or permanently, must obtain exit permission from the Government. Such permission has not been denied for political reasons. Emigration has long been an important and recognized escape valve from prevailing harsh economic conditions. Repatriation is a constitutional right of the citizen, and the Government does not discourage intending repatriates.

The law allows for revocation of citizenship on several grounds, including activities contrary to the interest of the country. However, there are no known cases of the Government instituting proceedings to deprive persons of citizenship for political reasons. There are at most only a handful of foreign refugees in Cape Verde.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The party's monopoly of power in Cape Verde is inscribed in the Constitution. Opposition parties do not exist and are not permitted. The small group of men who actually led the struggle for independence occupy positions of leadership in both the party and the Government. The Secretary General of the party is President of the Republic; the Deputy Secretary General is Prime Minister; and the third-ranking party official is President of the National Assembly. Altogether, eight of nine members of the party's political commission are also ministers; the other manages day-to-day activities of the party. Not all ministers or secretaries of state are party members; however, all clearly serve at the pleasure of the party. At the time of the party's second and most recent congress in 1983, there were 5,860 members, probably representing about five percent of the total adult population. This represented a doubling of party membership since independence in 1975. Women, at 14 percent of the total party membership, are underrepresented. The party is also young (47 percent under 30 years of age), disproportionately urban (50 percent in a nation which is more than two-thirds rural) and heavily representative of the bureaucracy (25 percent of party members are civil servants or employees of state enterprises). Within the elitist party, there exists a modest scope for meaningful political activity. The delegates to the second party congress and the leadership itself were elected by secret ballot with some unexpected changes in the order of precedence for various ministers. There was also an evident opening at the top level of the party to give individuals possessing less solid revolutionary credentials more prominent roles; 15 of 42 members and alternates, including three women, were elected to the national council for the first time.

The Popular National Assembly, last elected for a five-year term in 1980 from a party-approved list of candidates, is designated as the supreme organ of the Government. In fact, most day-to-day decisions are delegated to the Council of Ministers. The Assembly meets twice yearly in sessions at which earlier party/government decisions appear to be ratified. Although issues are debated openly with critical interventions reported in the media, earlier policy decisions made by the Council of Ministers are not reversed. Deputies who believe the interests of their constituencies are harmed by government policies or decisions feel free to criticize these policies or decisions and do so.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-Governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government in the past has permitted visits by private organizations to check on conditions of persons convicted for political or related offenses. There are no known instances in which the Government has been the subject of resolutions, investigations, or other human rights actions by official international organizations A few Cape Verdean emigrants living abroad have consistently made charges of human rights violations. These charges may have affected internal policies, given the Government's major effort to maintain close relations with the large communities of Cape Verdean emigrants around the world. There are no known internal official or non-governmental human rights organizations in the country. Amnesty International in its 1984 Report noted that the Government had released 18 persons convicted in 1982 for offenses against the security of the state, and repeated its charge that there had been insufficient evidence at their trial to prove their guilt. Freedom House terms Cape Verde "not free."

CAPE VERDE

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The Government gives a high priority to the prevention of famine, which has been averted since independence through food aid provided primarily by Western countries. Up to 20 percent of donated emergency food is distributed free to the old, infirm, or others unable to work. The remainder is sold under the terms of agreement with the donor and the proceeds used in development projects. The Government also has given priority to emergency development programs, financed primarily by foreign grants, to provide jobs for agricultural workers displaced by drought. Water and soil conservation programs and road and school construction are emphasized. Primary school attendance (age 7 to 12) has increased 300 percent since independence and is now available to about 80 percent of this group. Nonetheless, school conditions continue to be characterized by overcrowded classrooms and a paucity of trained teachers.

Over the past 150 years recurrent droughts and high unemployment (currently about 33 percent) have led to massive emigration, resulting in a large Cape Verdean overseas population estimated at about 500,000, of whom some 300,000 live in the United States. Emigrant remittances and official aid account for two-thirds of the country's gross national product (GNP). (U.S. food and development aid since independence exceeds $56 million.) Per capita GNP is estimated at about $350. The population of Cape Verde is about 310,000 and growing at a rate of 2 percent a year. With an infant mortality rate estimated at 76 per 1,000 live births and an overall death rate in 1980 of 8 per thousand, life expectancy at birth is 62 years. The adult literacy rate is 37 percent.

Racial discrimination is not a problem in Cape Verde, where the vast majority of the population shares various proportions of Portuguese-African ancestry. Sex discrimination exists sociologically, although banned by the Constitution. Many of the traditional, male-oriented values of the Portuguese and African ancestors of today's Cape Verdeans are still part of the country's culture. Women have been customarily excluded from certain types of work and are often paid less than men for comparable work. The Government has included women in the labor-intensive economic development projects financed by foreign grants. Both the Government and the party are making efforts to bring women into various economic and social activities where they have been traditionally absent. The Organization of Cape Verdean Women was founded in 1980, with party encouragement, to sensitize the Government and Cape Verdeans on issues affecting women. The code of the family, enacted in October 1981, prescribes full legal equality of men and women, including equal pay for equal work.

CENTRAL AFRICAN REPUBLIC

General Andre Dieudonne Kolingba has headed the Government of the Central African Republic since his accession to power in a bloodless coup on September 1, 1981. As head of the Military Committee for National Recovery, he holds all political power and is the final arbiter of all governmental matters. His all-military cabinet of ministers is supplemented by a small group of high commissioners who are largely technocrats.

Political party activities were suspended by Kolingba when he took power from David Dacko whose regime (1979-1981) had been characterized by politically exacerbated regional and tribal cleavages. Prior to that, Emperor Bokassa's control of the Government, the armed forces, the judiciary, and the sole political party was absolute.

During 1984 the Government faced less opposition than in prior years. A student strike in January, however, led to the arrest of several student leaders and several prominent political oppositionists.

The Central African Republic is a poor, landlocked, sparsely populated country. Its inhabitants for the most part derive their livelihood from subsistence agriculture. Only about one percent of the population has had university education. The essentially free enterprise agrarian economy, one of the world's least monetized, has suffered from inadequately coordinated and implemented government policies, occasional drought, and a poorly trained work force. Expatriates dominate the small manufacturing and commercial sectors of the economy. Corruption and abuse of position by public officials present additional difficulties. The Government has, however, taken some effective if modest steps to reduce corruption and increase the efficiency of the bureaucracy.

The number of political prisoners fluctuated during the year. Many were released during the course of the year until the fall when several dozen people, some prominent, were arrested for reasons that remain unclear. However, on December 31, 1984, President Kolingba ordered the release of 53 political prisoners, including several prominent opposition leaders.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There is no evidence of killings or summary execution for political motives by government forces.

b. Disappearance

There is no evidence that people have been abducted, secretly arrested, clandestinely detained, or that they disappeared as a result of government action.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The penal code prohibits torture and provides for sanctions against persons guilty of physical abuse. Nevertheless, there are reports of beatings in prisons and of inadequate medical attention. Conditions in prisons are poor.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Kolingba's Government has on occasion engaged in arbitrary arrest and imprisonment, particularly during its early months in power. When people are arrested, in some cases it may be a few days before their whereabouts are publicly known. Family members, legal counsel, doctors, and ministers of the faith have as a rule been given access to prisoners. Amnesty International reported that there had been more than 100 untried political detainees in Kassai camp at the beginning of 1983, but that 65 had been tried during the year and most of the others released uncharged. In 1984, the majority of those who were held for political reasons until the December 31, 1984 amnesty were considered to be major opposition leaders or figures capable of stirring up opposition to the regime. There are occasional reports of people arrested for simply criticizing the regime. In addition to the major political prisoners amnestied, a number of minor political prisoners were also released on December 31, 1984. It is difficult to say how many political detainees still remain since people continue to be picked up under suspicion and are only released when absolutely no evidence is found against them. Probably several dozen political detainees remain.

Under local law political detainees can be held without charge for as long as two months, but at that point detainees must either be formally charged or released. If charged, local judicial procedures (which are modeled on French procedures) allow for open-ended preventive detention while the public prosecutor prepares the state's case against the accused. Some political detainees are held much longer than two months, however, without formal charges being brought against them. Neither common criminals nor political prisoners can claim the right of habeas corpus. However, a procedure exists requiring that within a maximum of 96 hours in the first case and two months in the second, a detainee must physically be brought before an examining magistrate who considers whether formal charges will be filed against the prisoner.

In January 1984, five political opposition leaders, Messrs. Goumba, Maidou, Bozanga, Bomba-Bangabo and Sokambi, were placed under house arrest and "exiled" to the interior of the country. They were accused of inciting the students during their strike in protest of the Government's decision to establish competitive requirements for university scholarships and the civil service. In August 1984, Patrice Endjimoungou, secretary general of an illegal political party, was rearrested and exiled to the interior of the country for allegedly not respecting the political truce he had agreed to upon his release from prison in an amnesty granted by the President on September 1, 1983. However, President Kolingba signed a decree on December 31, 1984 releasing these 6 opposition leaders along with 47 other political prisoners. Another notable released was Joseph Potolot-Ngbanbadimbo, former Director General of the Central African Office of Social Security and close collaborator of emperor Bokassa. In addition, 14 people including some of those condemned by the special tribunal for involvement with the March 3, 1982 coup attempt had their sentences reduced.

About a half dozen well-known political opponents live in exile. Several have been sentenced to death in absentia for crimes against the state ascribed to them.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

In most common criminal cases, the Government permits the French-modeled legal procedures to be fairly and openly applied and the laws to be properly executed. Within this framework, Kolingba granted amnesty to about 100 petty criminals in September 1984. The courts are clearly dependent on the President. The Constitution, currently in suspension, nevertheless states that the judiciary is independent of the executive, but that its independence is guaranteed by the President.

A special tribunal comprising civilian magistrates and military advisers adjudicates political crimes. The special tribunal differs from ordinary courts in that there is no appeal except for the possibility of presidential clemency, and it can try a case only after being authorized by the President. The right of political detainees to counsel is not clear. In 1984 the tribunal met to consider the cases of persons accused of plotting the March 3, 1982, attempted coup d'etat. At least six persons were acquitted, and most of the others were given 3- to 8-year prison terms. Two former government officials each received 10-year prison terms for plotting against the security of the state. Those believed to be the instigators of the coup, Messrs. Pattasse, Mbaikou, and Bozize, remain in self-imposed exile.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Except for political and security matters, the Government does not generally intervene in the private life of citizens. There is no forced membership in any political organization; there is no interference with the right to marry or have children as one chooses; and parents are free to teach their children religious practices. The criminal code prohibits the invasion of the home without due process, and this right is apparently not generally abused in civil and minor criminal cases. If a political crime is involved, however, ordinance 81/035 (which instituted the special tribunal) authorizes searches any time, anywhere. These searches have been conducted without specific warrant.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The right to speak openly about political developments or to criticize the Government is circumscribed. The Government prohibits the distribution of tracts and literature deemed to be subversive. During 1984 several newspapers started publication on an irregular basis. Whether published privately or by the Government, they are carefully monitored. Both the radio and television are controlled by the Government. The television station was closed down in September 1984 by the President due to dissatisfaction with the quality of the transmission.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Only sports enthusiasts and devotees of cultural or religious pursuits of a non-political nature can assemble without fear of government repression. No effective labor movement has existed since the Government, in 1981, suspended trade union activities. The Government frowns on organized labor activities, although it tacitly approves of an apoliticized labor federation that exists mostly on paper. The International Labor Organization (ILO) has a case pending before it involving the Central African Republic's alleged violations of the right to freedom of association under ILO Convention 87. The Government has yet to provide the substantive information requested by the ILO committee reviewing the case. The Government has also been cited in the ILO for being in violation of ILO Conventions 29 and 105, for allegedly imposing compulsory labor on prisoners jailed for unauthorized political activities. In principle, the right to strike exists although fear of government reprisals has dampened the enthusiasm of potential strikers. However, university and school students went on strike for a month in January 1984 to protest government decrees establishing competitive entrance examinations in both the university and the civil service. Several student leaders were briefly arrested as were five political opponents whom the Government accused of fomenting anti-government sentiment among the students.

c. Freedom of Religion

Religious organizations and missionary groups are protected and provided religious freedom by the Constitution, currently in suspension. The Government does not generally interfere with religious activities. The expulsion of approximately 60 foreign adherents of the Unification Church in January 1983 is the only known exception. No one religion predominates, nor does the Government appear to discriminate in favor of or against specific religions. About one-fourth of the population adheres to animist beliefs.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

People are generally free to move about within the country, although there are frequent road checkpoints. The right of voluntary travel and repatriation is recognized, and there appears to be no sexual discrimination in its application. Financial and educational constraints rather than government controls restrict most foreign travel and emigration. The country remains relatively hospitable to foreigners; the largest foreign population living temporarily or permanently in the country is from Chad. There are about 5,000 refugees in the Bangui capital area. While some make a living on their own, the vast majority rely on U.N. relief. In September and October, approximately 30,000 refugees--mostly women, children, and the aged--arrived in the north from southern Chad. Although they have settled temporarily in border towns, the Government is working with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) to move them to settlements farther away from the border. No case of revocation of citizenship was reported in 1984.

CENTRAL AFRICAN REPUBLIC

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The Government is headed by Chief of State General Andre Dieudonne Kolingba. He rules with the assistance of 15 fellow officers who constitute the Military Committee For National Recovery, each of whom also holds a cabinet post. In addition, he is advised by eight civilian High Commissioners who head their own departments.

President Kolingba holds in principle all political power, appointing, dismissing, and reshuffling members of his cabinet. In practice, he allows his cabinet considerable leeway in the day-to-day activities of government administration although he makes all important policy decisions and is the final arbiter of all government matters. Since September 1, 1981, all forms of public and private assembly for political purposes have been proscribed. Kolingba has stated he has "no intention of returning his country to the turbulent multiparty experience of the Dacko Regime." His September 1984 promise of "progressive establishment of democratic institutions" seems unlikely to lead to any quick or far-reaching changes in political rights.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government does not welcome and is sensitive to international or non-govermental investigations of alleged human rights abuses but does not prohibit such investigations. Representatives of Amnesty International and the International Committee of the Red Cross visit Bangui periodically to attend public trials and to assess the situation in the prisons. In its 1984 report, Amnesty International was concerned about the imprisonment of prisoners of conscience, long term detention without trial of suspected opponents of the Government, procedural shortcomings at the trials of political prisoners, and allegations of harsh prison conditions. Freedom House terms the Central African Republic "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The economy has suffered in the past 15 years from poor policies, inept management, and corruption. The Government's ability to stimulate the economy depends on massive and long-term contributions of financial and human resources from abroad. Current government plans focus on strengthening the agricultural sector, primarily through road building/ maintenance programs and encouraging cash crop production, and on upgrading other basic infrastructure. Agricultural production during 1984 was good. The cotton harvest surpassed official estimates, and the coffee crop also did well despite the damages from the 1983 drought. In 1982 per capita gross national product was around $308. During 1984 the Government continued to implement austere financial measures for its civil service and budget for a third straight year. The Government made major efforts to reduce the bloated civil service. Thus, urban employment conditions became especially poor. Current government policy aims to discourage rural migration by promoting rural development; 1984 increases in the price of cotton may discourage the rural exodus.

CENTRAL AFRICAN REPUBLIC

Despite the ravages of tropical diseases and an infant mortality rate of 135.7 per 1,000 live births, the country's population of about 2.6 million still grows by 2.8 percent per year. Life expectancy at birth is only 47 years, because of inadequate or simply nonexistent health care in most of the country. Although health care is accorded a high priority by the Government, it is handicapped by lack of trained personnel, and the inaccessibility of large parts of the country. In 1976, 40 percent of the urban population and 5 percent of the rural populaton had access to safe water; in all, 16 percent of the country's population had access to safe water. In 1977, the average Central African received 95 percent of the required caloric supply.

Almost all education in the country is government supported. Total school population is about 310,000 (primary through university levels). In 1980, about 67 percent of the adult population was illiterate (51.7 percent of the men and 80.8 percent of the women); undoubtedly this rate is far higher in the rural areas. The Government is making a concerted effort to train more teachers and to build more schools for those living outside the capital. In 1979, primary school enrollment was 96.72 percent of males and 52.54 percent of females of primary school age.

Women are generally accorded a lower status than men in the Central African Republic. Their work at home and in the fields prevents many of them from receiving an education. Polygamy is common, but the legal system and traditional practice support the rights of wives and all children of such marriages. A National Women's Organization exists which is supported by the Government. There are no women cabinet members or high commissioners in the Kolingba Government.

CHAD

Chad is governed by an authoritarian regime dominated by President El Hadj Hissein Habre, who came to power in 1982. He heads a French-style Council of Ministers which, along with an appointed National Consultative Council, comprises the executive and legislative branches of the Government. President Habre established in 1984 a single-party heterogenous political organization, the National Union for Independence and Revolution, to attract wider multi-ethnic representation. Chad has been in a state of civil strife since 1965, with various factions and as many as 11 different armies, contending for control of the country. During the prolonged civil war, institutions that might be expected to provide for the protection of human rights, such as the judiciary, largely disintegrated.

The northern third of Chad was under military occupation in 1984 by an estimated 5,000 Libyan troops and some 6,000 Libyan-supported rebel forces, headed by ex-President Goukouni Oueddei. Elsewhere, southern insurgents increased operations throughout parts of central and southern Chad against military and civilian targets. Together with government reprisals, this action created a cycle of escalating violence and human rights violations. Owing to indiscipline, government and rebel forces alike committed arson, rape, robbery, and summary executions.

In 1984 Libya concluded but did not honor an agreement with France for mutual military withdrawal from Chad. Since occupied Chad was closed to outside observers, it is difficult to document human rights abuses in the north, but reports suggest a record of massive violations by the Libyans. In this desert region they banned Chadian customs as well as the French language, and Libyan leader Colonel Muammar Qadhafi tried to inculcate his social-political philosophy. Libya also continued to funnel materiel and money to the insurgents in southern Chad throughout the year. The southern insurgents' unwillingness to resolve their differences with the Government reflects the difficulty of getting the country's diverse ethnic and religious groups to make common cause. This report addresses human rights concerns in both occupied and unoccupied areas.

Despite military action on several fronts, the Habre Government took some important steps in 1984. It cooperated with the International Committee of the Red Cross in March to ensure prisoners of war better treatment. It amnestied 150 political prisoners on May 19. It returned to Sudan in September 121 Sudanese mercenaries held as prisoners of war. It is pursuing an accommodation with dissidents in exile, whom it hopes to integrate into Chad's sole political party. Despite the lack of success in 1984, the Government is attempting to come to terms with the dissidents in southern Chad and to integrate them into the Chadian national armed forces. Moreover, it strengthened Chad's judicial administration by naming additional judges. If Libya would honor its mutual troop withdrawal agreement with France, prospects for national reconciliation and the human rights situation would be enhanced.

Chad's five million people remain extremely poor. About 90 percent of the population are semi-nomadic or in subsistence agriculture. The country derives its foreign exchange and much of its national income from the sale of cotton and livestock; the modern monetized economy involves essentially only the small minority of people in Chad's four cities or their environs. Apart from the capital city of N'Djamena, much of Chad's agricultural and industrial activity occurs in the south. The insurgency there impedes economic growth, exacerbating the lack of investment capital and the effects of a drought of historic proportions.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

The continuing war with Libya and the southern insurgency and the Government's efforts to combat it have all led to killings for political reasons. In southern Chad, the claims and counterclaims of arbitrary executions by government and rebel forces make an exact rendering of the number of political killings impossible.

One of the dissident groups, the "Organization for the Liberation of Chad from Imperialism and Fascism," claimed responsibility for the assassination of nine Chadian and three Zairian soldiers between February 9 and March 11. On March 10, a commercial airliner was blown up on the ground at N'Djamena airport by an unknown opposition group, injuring 28 persons and killing one. An insurgent group charged in April that government forces had killed 90 civilians and wounded another 70 in the Beinamar/Laramanaye regions of southern Chad during the last 2 weeks of February, but other sources suggest the number killed and wounded was substantially less.

Increased insurgency in August, September, and October resulted in perhaps a dozen summary executions of southerners suspected of supporting the rebel forces. Thirty to 40 innocent civilians may have been killed in the crossfire of skirmishes between government and rebel forces. In reprisal for attacks by rebels, government forces are known to have burned several southern villages, causing the death of an unknown number of civilians. The rebels are reported to have assassinated several southerners who supported the Government.

The Libyan occupation of northern Chad was marked by alleged executions of an unknown number of political opponents during much of the year. Several Chadians, who once supported rebel forces in the occupied zone, have asserted that Libyan troops had indiscriminately killed many Chadians fleeing south in 1984.

b. Disappearance

Against the backdrop of increasing violence, there were a number of reports of disappearances in all areas: of Chadians who refused to collaborate with insurgents in southern Chad; of several persons detained by the Government for suspected symphathy with rebel forces, including two seriously wounded rebel soldiers; and of Chadians in occupied Chad who refused to collaborate with the Libyans. Rebel forces in the north abducted two Belgians (employed by the non-governmental organization, Doctors without Frontiers) on January 24 in the course of a raid against a government outpost. Upon their release in Tripoli, Libya, on April 2, a spokesman for the rebel group warned humanitarian organizations to abstain from helping "the enemy" or risk having their personnel treated as mercenaries.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Reports indicate that incidents of torture occurred during 1984. One person who claimed to have been incarcerated in a detention center at the Chadian Presidency ("Les Jardins"), alleged hearing screams of pain there. Rebel prisoners interviewed by French journalists in late September stated that they had been harshly treated by the Government and that about 50 had died of torture or hunger. However, they also confirmed that conditions improved after the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) took responsibility for their welfare in March. One former prisoner asserted that some prisoners who had not had ICRC attention slowly starved because they had no family to provide them with food and the Government claimed it did not have the resources to do so. In the countryside, government forces have been accused of arson and rape, and of lesser humiliations of persons thought to be sympathetic to rebel forces. The Government has acknowledged these abuses and in some cases disciplined the soldiers and officials responsible. Rebels in southern Chad have maimed peasants who have refused to cooperate with them. In the north, reports indicate that the occupation forces deprived detainees of food, water, and medicine, and used other forms of torture in consolidating control.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

In non-occupied Chad a well-developed criminal code has evolved from the corpus of law inherited from France. No analogous code of law governs the detention of persons thought to be endangering the security of the state. A majority of the detainees in Chad are persons captured in combat or counterinsurgency operations. Few, if any, of them have been charged with treason or espionage by an independent judiciary. The Government has detained without warrant about 1,000 persons for political opposition. Such persons were among the 150 political detainees amnestied on May 19. The Government of Chad stated that El Hadj Ali Mohammed, an Imam at Abeche, is now free; Amnesty International was concerned that he had been detained without charge.

Libyan occupation forces allegedly deported about 1,200 young Chadian women and girls to Libya between July 1983 and March 1984. During the same period, some 2,000 males between the ages of 14 and 40 were reportedly impressed into the Islamic Legion, a Libyan-organized mercenary force.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Chad's criminal code prohibits unjustified police arrests and sets out clearly the rights and responsibilities of detainees, prosecutors, and magistrates. The code also ensures a detainee's right to be represented by counsel and to be charged or released within a specified period of time, or to be informed of the charges against him which warrant preventive detention. These rights were particularly neglected during 1978-1982, at the height of the civil war. The Government has increased the number of judges, and lately investigating magistrates are applying these provisions of the freedom of association, and employment discrimination. Concern was also expressed that provisions of Chadian law appeared to violate these conventions. In 1984 the Committee noted the serious problems faced by Chad in fulfilling its obligations and called for ILO assistance to the Government.

In the Libyan/rebel-occupied area of northern Chad, indigenous Chadians were prevented from gathering in groups numbering more than three persons in the large oases of Faya Largeau and Fada during at least part of the year.

c. Freedom of Religion

Islam, Christianity, and animism are freely practiced. The country has remained multi-religious despite domestic and foreign pressures in favor of Islam. More than 50 percent of Chad's population profess faith in Islam, and the percentage is growing. Recently several high-level Chadian officials have said that Catholic priests in southern Chad are abetting the insurgents. Yet there is no information to suggest that the practice of Christianity or animism is a bar to advancement in government service. The Libyans limit religious practice in the occupied zone, in keeping with Colonel Qadhafi's view of his mission to spread Islam.

d. Freedom of Movement within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The movement of persons throughout Chad continues to be circumscribed by the insurgency and occupation. The Libyan occupation of northern Chad compelled some 80,000 persons to relocate elsewhere in Chad. Chadians remaining in the occupied zone could move from one area to another only if they possessed passes issued by Libyan officials. Unconfirmed reports indicate that up to 40,000 Chadians sought refuge in the Central African Republic and 110,000 in Sudan, owing to the combined effects of drought and insurgency. The increased violence in southern Chad during the last half of 1984 reversed the flow of refugees returning to Chad. In the south travel has been further impeded by roadblocks set up by government forces and by rebel ambushes. International travel is permitted. Chadians may obtain regular passports by paying about $42, provided they have been cleared by Chad's internal security services; and regulations call for these investigations normally to be completed within a week. There are no known instances of the denial of a passport or laissez-passer for political reasons. The Government announced that all Chadians in exile are free to return to Chad.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The present political system does not allow for change of government by the people. Chad continues to be governed by President El Hadj Hissein Habre who heads a French-style Council of Ministers complemented by an appointed National Consultative Council. Both councils are carefully balanced ethnically and regionally. President Habre draws his authority from the allegiance of a large part of the armed forces and the security services of the country's sole political party, the National Union for Independence and Revolution. Created in June 1984, the party embraces a much wider ethnic representation than did its predecessor, the Command Council of the Northern Armed Forces, and its establishment was intended as a step toward the participation of a larger number of Chadians in the country's political life. President Habre plans eventually to enlarge the party's executive structures in order to accommodate Chadians in exile. The party's by-laws mandate the popular election of lower-level officials who, in turn, will vote for party officers at the level immediately above. No elections have yet been scheduled. At present, laws, decrees, and ordinances are decided jointly only by the President and the Council of Ministers.

In the occupied zone, Libyan military and civilian officials have obliged Chadians to establish "people's committees" modeled on those in Libya. The leadership of the rebel "Transitional Government of National Unity" (GUNT) is Chadian; its head is former president Goukouni Oueddei. GUNT represents various factions indebted to Libya.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Amnesty International in its 1984 report (covering 1983) expressed concern about alleged extrajudicial executions and the detention without trial of real or suspected political opponents of the Habre Government. Amnesty International also reported in 1984 on violations in the south, including summary executions by government forces. In November 1984, the Government sharply criticized Amnesty International and said attention should be focused on the root cause of the situation, the Libyan occupation. In the occupied zone, Amnesty International has not been permitted to probe into alleged violations of human rights. Nevertheless, it has reportedly charged the Libyan authorities with implementing summary justice and executions.

The International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) suspended its operations in the occupied zone in May owing to its inability to visit government troops held prisoner by rebel and Libyan forces. In unoccupied Chad, the ICRC has been operating with minimal restrictions since March. The League of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies and the Chadian National Red Cross continue to provide large quantities of food and medicine to Chadians who have been affected by an unprecedented drought. Freedom House rates Chad "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Civil strife has ravaged much of Chad in the last 19 years, but continuing drought and increasing desertification have exacerbated the decline in national output in the last year. The typical Chadian lives in a pre-industrial and pastoral economy, and the per capita GNP of $78 (1982) will undoubtedly be reduced further next year because of persisting unfavorable climatic conditions. Throughout much of 1984, France's 3,000 troops in Chad buoyed up small-scale commercial activities and private investment, but their departure under the Franco-Libyan troop withdrawal accord will depress economic growth.

Mortality and longevity rates, like national income data, show that Chad's population of about 5 million people ranks among the world's most underprivileged. World Bank data for 1984 indicate that life expectancy at birth is 44.1 years and infant mortality is 141.9 per 1,000 live births. However, other figures suggest average life expectancy lies in the range of 40-43 years and the infant mortality rate between 150 and 210 per 1,000 live births. The Ministry of Health estimates that there are only 20-30 Chadian physicians in the entire country, and perhaps another 75 physicians are affiliated with non-governmental organizations; goverment per capita health expenditure ($0.90) is also one of the lowest in the world. It is certain that the typical Chadian now satisfies much less than the 74 percent of the suggested caloric requirement that was recorded in 1977, a year considered good by current standards. An ever-increasing number of Chadians depend on international food aid to keep alive. Up to 3,000 people died of starvation in 1984. No more than 26 percent of the population had access to safe drinking water in 1975, the last year for which reliable data are available. Only 20 percent of the population is functionally literate, and in 1976 primary school enrollment was only about 34 percent of the primary school-age population. Despite the hostilities, most of the educational institutions in unoccupied Chad are now being operated in some way after being closed for five years.

Women are generally subordinate to men in Chadian society. Girls do attend school at all levels of the educational system. Some women participate in the political life of the country as, for example, the Minister of Social and Women's Affairs, who is also a member of the party's Executive Committee. Some women serve voluntarily in the armed forces, and some figure prominently in the labor movement. Although figures are not known, many women and their children have been left homeless and without adequate means of support, with their husbands missing or dead in civil strife. Widows and orphans are, however, often taken care of by members of the extended family.

Economic and demographic data pertaining to occupied Chad are not available. Much of the northern desert economy was damaged by intense Libyan bombing in 1983. Several reports indicate that sizable quantities of livestock were shipped to Libya during 1984 without compensation paid to their Chadian owner/herders. Persons who have escaped from occupied Chad have alleged that the Libyans use food as a weapon to keep inhabitants in line.

THE COMOROS*

The Federal Islamic Republic of the Comoros is a federation of three small islands of the Comoran archipelago, which lies at the northern entrance to the Mozambique channel. The Republic lays claim as well to the fourth island of the archipelago, Mayotte, which at the time of independence in 1975 voted to remain with France. A Constitution adopted by popular referendum in 1978 established a federal system with elected governors for each island and an elected presidency.

President Ahmed Abdallah Abderemane unilaterally declared the archipelago's independence from France in 1975, after 90 years of colonial tutelage. Overthrown in late 1975, he was returned to power in 1978 following the mercenary-led ouster of the repressive, xenophobic regime of Ali Soilih. Abdallah was reelected unopposed in 1984, but the election was boycotted by the opposition. In recent years constitutional amendments have strengthened his position, notably in the appointment of governors and in the establishment of a single legal political party, the United Progress Party.

A 25-30 man mercenary force continues to train and lead the Presidential Guard, the best-equipped and prepared security force in the islands. French technical assistance is provided to the small Comoran armed forces and the gendarmerie. Each island administration also has a local police force.

Agriculture remains the basis of economic activity, but with a population of 450,000 that will double by the year 2000, the Comoros are rapidly approaching full utilization of their arable land. Exports of copra, vanilla, essence of ylang-ylang, and cloves do not begin to cover the cost of necessary imports. There are no industries, inadequate port facilities, and a limited highway and communications infrastructure. The Comoros are part of the francophone Africa monetary zone and depend heavily on France for budgetary support and technical assistance.

Products of a conservative Islamic society, Comoran leaders do not recognize the full range of civil and political liberties. Village notables and religious leaders dominate local politics while three major families, of which the President's is one, control the lion's share of the import-export business. Farming on small landholdings, subsistence fishing, and petty commerce make up the daily activity of most of the population.

The Comoros have only a rudimentary institutional framework. Outside the major towns, traditional village life guides all social conduct. Comoran justice is casually administered. The legal system is a mixture of Islamic law and an inherited French legal code. A new consolidated code is slowly being drafted. Most disputes are settled by village notables or by a civil court of first instance.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no reports of political killings in 1984.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of disappearance in 1984.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The federal Constitution guarantees the liberty and security of each individual. Penal discipline is very lax. Prisoners are released daily for prayers and work. Families provide them with their regular meals.

There were reports in 1983 of some beatings of political detainees, but none in 1984 (see section 4).

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Although about 20 officials associated with the Ali Soilih regime were held without trial from 1978-80, 14 of these were tried in 1980 and received sentences from life imprisonment to 6 months' incarceration. According to the Government, the remaining detainees have since been released. This has not been confirmed by independent sources. Several opponents of Abdallah's administration, members of a French-based coalition, were detained in early 1984. They have reportedly been released without trial, although this has not been confirmed. In early November 1984, seven individuals were arrested and charged with plotting the armed overthrow of the Government. As of December 31, they had not been brought to trial.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution provides for the equality of all citizens before the law and the right of all accused to defense. The judiciary is independent and trials are public. The present penal code was inherited from the French colonial period and is being revised. Most disputes are settled under traditional law by village notables. Other civil cases are brought to the courts of first instance on each of the three islands.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution provides for the inviolability of home and property. There were no known cases of arbitrary interference with privacy in 1984.

COMOROS

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Although the Constitution guarantees freedom of expression, of thought, and of conscience, the only local news medium is the government-controlled radio station, which is self-censoring when covering domestic events. No independent local news publications exist, but there are a few clandestine tracts critical of the regime. The Comoros have no print media, although the Government plans to begin a weekly newspaper in early 1985. Foreign journals and newspapers are readily available, as are books from abroad. Comorans discuss and criticize their Government and its leading personalities in private.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

While the Constitution states that freedom of association and freedom to form unions are guaranteed, as well as the right to strike, in practice these rights are limited. The only legal political activity allowed is within the United Progress Party. However, social occasions, such as the lavish, traditional Comoran wedding feasts, are scenes of intense political maneuvering. There were no reports of public gatherings being forbidden in 1984. Although the right to strike is guaranteed, the wage labor force is small and unions are not effectively organized. The scarcity of jobs is also a real restraint on labor complaints. In the public sector, the Government broke a teachers' strike in 1982 by hiring new teachers. Hospital workers reportedly struck in late 1983 to claim unpaid wages, and many Government civil servants engaged in slowdowns and stoppages for the same reason. Unrest appeared to ease considerably in 1984 with regular payment of wages.

c. Freedom of Religion

The large majority of the population (86 percent) is Muslim, and, according to the Constitution, Islam is the "wellspring of the principles and rules which guide the state and its institutions." However, most aspects of freedom of religion and the right to practice openly non-Islamic faiths are guaranteed and respected in practice. There are established churches for Protestants and Catholics. While Christian missionaries work in local hospitals and schools, they are not allowed to proselytize openly.

d. Freedom of Movement within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no restrictions on freedom of movement in and out of the Comoros for either citizens or foreigners. Travel within the Comoros is also unrestricted for citizens and foreigners. There is an exile community that opposes the Government, but no exiles who returned to the Comoros in 1984 are known to have been subjected to reprisal by the Government.

COMOROS

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

President Abdallah has dominated the Comoran Government since his return to power in 1978 and, unopposed, was overwhelmingly reelected to a second term as President in September 1984. A member of the French-based opposition to Abdallah reportedly attempted to get his name on the ballot but was disqualified on technical grounds. There were also unverified charges of electoral fraud during the presidential election, and non-Comoran observers have stated that the announced percentage of eligible voters participating conflicted with their own observations of low turnout in some areas. However, most observers of the Comoran political scene believe that Abdallah would have won the election under any circumstances, although with somewhat less than 99 percent.

Abdallah commands the personal loyalty of the Presidential Guard, the most formidable security force in the country. His position is buttressed both by tradition and by his own personal wealth. He also appoints ministers and governors.

Leading figures of the Government and the society vie for influence and the eventual mantle of the Presidency. At the legislative level, there are 38 members in the National Assembly. Within the one-party structure, the 1982 elections were freely contested and seats won without massive majorities (60 percent is considered a strong mandate). Most contests went into second-round voting and the legislature acquired several new members.

A referendum on the status of Mayotte scheduled for 1984 was postponed by the French Government. No new date was set. In 1977, 96 percent of the voters in Mayotte opted in favor of remaining with France.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Comoros permitted a visit from Amnesty International in 1981, but there is no recent information on human rights investigations. In its 1984 report (covering 1983) Amnesty International said its principal concerns were the short-term detention or imprisonment of suspected political opponents of the Government and the beating or ill-treatment of political detainees, some of whom, Amnesty International said, may have been prisoners of conscience. Freedom House rates the Comoros "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The Comoros are a small, poor, traditional island society. The constitutional deference to Islam is but a formalization of the deeply held commitment of most Comorans to an Islamic world view. This commitment, reinforced by two and one-half wretched years of experience with a radical socialist regime under Ali Soilih, has set Comorans in stern opposition to socialist options. This is particularly true of the older generation, which once again controls wealth and wields influence. The Comoran commitment to a free society is essentially a traditional Islamic one of an open market place, tolerance for other religions, and equality of Muslims before Allah. At the same time, the society retains many aspects of its feudal origins, including an established traditional hierarchy whose authority is based on inheritance, age, and wealth or religious leadership.

Within Comoran society, men have a dominant role. At traditional ceremonies and social gatherings the sexes are separated. Yet women are neither veiled nor limited to minor civil service posts with the Government. The Constitution provides for the equality of citizens regardless of race, sex, or religion, and suffrage is universal, although the opinions of husbands and fathers exercise a formidable influence over women's voting habits. Women have the right to participate in the political process, but tradition has so far discouraged the exercise of that right.

Economic prospects for the Comoros are dim. The population of 450,000 is growing at a rate of 2.9 percent per year and most arable land is already being cultivated. There are no evident prospects for industrialization. As a result of the significant efforts made in education since the mid-1970's, the primary school enrollment radio in 1980 for males was 116.5 per cent and 86.5 percent for females. The number of secondary school graduates has doubled in the past few years. However, there are few jobs for these graduates.

Markets for the Comoros' tropical cash crops are fragile and dwindling. The per capita GNP of $339 (1982 statistic) is likely to decrease in real terms as export levels stagnate and population grows. An abundance of tropical fruits and fish keeps the population from serious malnutrition. Calorie levels are 93 percent (1977 statistic) of requirements. Major food commodities such as rice must be imported. Long-term international help in the form of food aid and technical assistance for crop diversification seems necessary in the foreseeable future for the Comoros. The leadership is hoping that new technical training programs will prepare youth for off-island jobs.

CONGO

The People's Republic of the Congo is officially a Marxist-Leninist state. It has a single legal party, the Congolese Labor Party, which controls the policies and leadership of the Government, the media, and the military. The party also directs the national organizations of various social groups such as workers, farmers, women, the elderly, and youth. The executive organ of the party is its 75-member central committee which elects a president, who serves as President of the Republic and chief of state, head of government, and president of the Council of Ministers. He also selects the 13-member political bureau, the key policymaking group. Within the central committee, members from the northern regions of the country are in the majority and hold the balance of power, even though they are a minority of the population. The military and security services are also firmly under the control of the northerners, and they ultimately hold the key to power in the Congo. Decisions are made at the top and executed through the party and its control over the organs of government. The need to maintain consensus among the political leaders representing areas traditionally in conflict provides a check on arbitrary policies.

The third Party Congress in 1984 was marked by three major trends: the consolidation of presidential power, a strengthening of the party organization, and an effort to reinforce the role of the formal organs of government. Other decisions approved by the party congress included the establishment of a constitutional council to rule on the constitutionality of laws and treaties, and the limitation of the jurisdiction of the "revolutionary courts" to acts against the security of the state. Other crimes against the state, such as fraud in state enterprises, were transferred to the regular judicial system with its procedures and safeguards.

The security apparatus, which is under the direction of the presidency, is patterned after those in Eastern Europe but is less pervasive. Its principal objective is to protect the state, e.g., to watch for any possible political dissident activity.

While not politically free, the Congolese go about their daily lives with a minimum of government or police interference. Although there have been scattered incidents of terrorism during the last couple of years, terrorism is not generally a problem and the crime rate is relatively low. Contact between Congolese and foreigners is open, and the Congolese, while refraining from direct political criticism of the Government, discuss economic and social problems with frankness and objectivity. The tendency in the country is toward a more open society and expanded contacts with the West, particularly given the need for foreign investment and technology.

The Congo has a mixed economic system--state and private. With a per capita gross national product of roughly $1,360, the Congo is relatively prosperous, with about three-fifths of government receipts coming from oil revenues. The country has experienced a real economic growth rate of eight percent per year since 1979.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

During 1984 there were no reported instances of killing for political motives.

b. Disappearance

During 1984 there were no reported instances of disappearance.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The practice of beating suspects at police stations and the state security offices in the course of interrogations is not uncommon. Neither is it uncommon for the public and the police to beat thieves caught red-handed. Two Zairian thieves were reportedly beaten to death last year. There continue to be occasional cases of militiamen harassing both Congolese and foreigners. This harassment takes place in many instances to obtain money, cigarettes, beer, and the like. However, the use of militiamen is steadily decreasing as trained police assume an increased and improved role.

Prison conditions in general are poor, and there is a lack of adequate food, hygiene, and medical care. Prisoners generally have access to family, friends, attorneys, and others. In the past, political prisoners have been held incommunicado.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Whereas the Constitution guarantees protection against arbitrary indictment, arrest, and detention, in practice a warrant is not required to make arrests. There is a habeas corpus provision, but in cases involving the security of the state, people arrested can be held without a court hearing. Individuals detained for non-political offenses are entitled to an attorney and are judged by a generally impartial judiciary. Given the slow pace of administrative processing, even though the Government has taken steps to increase the number of magistrates and to improve the processing of cases, persons awaiting trial are often detained for considerable periods, and sufficient funds for their upkeep have not been budgeted by the Government. After the November 1984 release of former President Yhomby Opango, the Congo has only one known political prisoner--former number two in the party, Thystere Tchicaya. He is believed to be under house arrest and is not permitted contact with the outside world.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution provides for a Supreme Court which is in practice an arm of the Government rather than an independent body. By law, the right to a fair and public trial exists in all cases, but some prisoners have been held for months without trial. The legal system is not insulated from political interference. Lawyers are permitted to argue circumstances surrounding the case. It is not uncommon to have a higher court reverse the verdict of a lower one in the event of irregularities.

CONGO

The amended Constitution provides for non-professional judges to be elected to any court below the Supreme Court. The stated purpose of this change was to "popularize" justice. According to the law, any Congolese citizen may now become a judge, but can decide cases only in collaboration with trained judges. Each nomination must be approved by the party.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

There is little interference with privacy, family, home, or correspondence by the Government. Individuals are not forced to participate in the party or its organs. There are only 8,600 members in the party out of a population of 1.745 million. The Constitution provides for the inviolable secrecy of mail and all other forms of correspondence except in the cases of criminal investigations, defense mobilization, or state of war.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and press are restricted, despite guarantees in the Constitution. The state owns and controls the media (except for one weekly church newspaper). News reports in the government-owned media come from a variety of sources, including several foreign press agencies and French satellite feeds. The party is selective in the kinds of news and information it permits Congolese journalists to publish from various outside sources of information. Television viewers have access to Zairian media programs. While the Government keeps control over the press, in practice foreign journalists can move freely about the country. Photography, however, is subject to security controls, and permits must be obtained even for commonplace photos in the cities. The Government allows some domestic criticism of policies and programs judged not to be politically sensitive, but it does not allow its authority to be challenged. Journalists may raise issues and concerns only within general guidelines laid down by the party. There are regular radio and television programs featuring dialogue between journalists and government officials. While these discussions are relatively frank, they are limited to specific programs and policies already under scrutiny by the Government. The state censorship board reviews the content of newspapers, movies, books, and records. Publications are subject to censorship if they contain articles which are critical, are contrary to the image the Government wishes to project either internally or externally, or judged to be contrary to social welfare. For example, one issue of the church newspaper was seized and burned as a result of some mild criticism of the third party congress, and a warning to the church was later published in the party's official organ. In general, however, considerable material which could be censored under these guidelines is allowed to circulate.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The right to peaceful assembly is limited by the State's perceived self-interest. Political meetings are restricted to the party and its organizations. Government permission is not required for groups to assemble for religious and social purposes, but is required for use of official facilities. Government authorization is needed to start a formal club or organization.

Given its past active political role, the labor movement is closely scrutinized and controlled by the Government and party. The Congolese Trade Union Confederation represents workers, but as an appendage of the state. Its head is a member of the party's political bureau. It is prohibited from striking, although wildcat strikes occur with relative impunity. The Trade Union Confederation is represented in every ministry and state-owned enterprise and serves on mandatory boards which include a union representative along with a member of the administration and the party. Known as the "determinant trilogy," this structure is responsible for ensuring that the three major points of view are represented in the decision-making process. The local unions within the confederation have been able to persuade the Government to provide workers with transportation, cafeteria facilities, increased medical benefits, vacation time with pay, travel, and housing. However, no group is allowed to form an independent, alternative union outside the party. Officers of the confederation at the national level must be approved by the party. The confederation is permitted to maintain relations with recognized international organizations such as the International Labor Organization.

c. Freedom of Religion

In theory, freedom of religion is guaranteed by law. In practice, party members are prohibited from practicing religion. Adherents to the Jehovah's Witnesses are not allowed to exercise their right to worship, allegedly because Witnesses do not recognize the authority of the state. Beyond this, the party does not normally interfere in religious association. The Catholic Church, the largest congregation, maintains a seminary for the training of the clergy and has missions all over the country. Masses are held in the various local languages as well as French. The Catholic church publishes the only independent newspaper, La Semaine Africaine. Missionaries are active in running private missions and clinics and other social services for the handicapped, etc. Some of these services are joint ventures between the church and the Government. However, many of the former services provided by the church have been abolished, and the Government is officially atheist. Christmas Day is called Children's Day.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Government exercises limited control over the internal movement of its citizens through identification card checks. Control points also are manned in Brazzaville and soldiers occasionally shoot people who fail to follow their instructions or who inadvertently drive into restricted zones at night. Congolese citizens who wish to travel abroad require exit authorization from the office of State Security. For the average citizen this is a fairly routine process. However, those who may be suspected of political motives encounter some difficulty. Government employees traveling abroad must obtain permission from the appropriate government office. Passports must be returned to the state security office after the traveler's return.

Control over foreigners is very tight. Most visas are for one entry only, exit visas are required, and almost all long-time residents such as missionaries spend considerable time dealing with government red tape.

CONGO

The Congo is the home of numerous exiles and refugees, mostly from surrounding central African states. Most refugees, including some Zairians, are permitted to travel to other countries for settlement under the auspices of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. While refugees are usually safe in the Congo, they are subject to surveillance and occasional harassment by the Congolese Government.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The Congo is governed by an elite group of party and cabinet officials. Military officers occupy key positions among the ruling group and help ensure its continuation in power. The people do not have the right to change the government through democratic processes. Opportunities for political involvement by Congolese citizens are limited to the Marxist-Leninist Congolese Labor Party, including the national, regional, and local assemblies and the "mass" organizations. No other political parties are permitted to operate. Party membership, which presently numbers approximately 8,600, is highly controlled on the basis of loyalty and performance.

The third party congress in 1984 declared the National Assembly the supreme organ of state and the only organ to make law. The national, regional, and local assemblies are "elected" from single-party approved lists. While policy decisions are usually made by the central committee and political bureau, assemblies at the local and regional levels may discuss issues before the decisions are made at the national level. Representatives of the National Assembly are chosen from all walks of life, including traditional leaders, peasants, and workers, but selection is made by the party. The Assembly has impact on social and some economic issues. In general, however, its power to make decisions outside the will of the political leadership is restricted. Its decisions generally mirror the wishes of the Government.

The last "elections" for local, regional, and national assemblies, were held in 1984. Opposition groups are illegal. Opponents of the Government within the Congo keep a very low profile. Occasionally tracts are distributed by opposition groups, but they do not appear to enjoy much political support.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government has demonstrated some willingness to respond to human rights inquiries on a case-by-case basis. Amnesty International's 1984 Report (covering 1983) noted that 50 political detainees had been released. Freedom House rates the Congo "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

With its small population and relatively high per capita income the Congo is one of Africa's more prosperous countries. The economy is based predominantly on petroleum, which accounts for about 90 percent of export earnings. In 1982 the Government inaugurated a five-year plan designed to rationalize investment and create a viable economy to sustain the country after the depletion of known petroleum reserves. The plan focuses on infrastructure, agriculture, forestry, and light productive industry. The Government encourages private investment and offers special incentives in areas of prime interest, such as forestry and agriculture. The Congo had a real economic growth rate of some eight percent a year since 1979, and major urban centers appear prosperous.

There is a marked disparity between urban and rural standards of living, however, and resultant heavy migration from the countryside. It is estimated that the average per capita GNP of rural Congolese, constituting some 60 percent of the population, is less than one-twelfth that of their urban counterparts. Rural migration is straining social services in the cities and depriving the rural areas of farmers. Approximately 80 percent of the economy remains in the hands of the private sector--predominantly foreign-owned and operated.

Improvements in health and nutrition have resulted in an increase in the average life expectancy to over 61 years. The fertility of the soil, abundance of indigenous fruits, vegetables, and fish, and the reliability of water sources around the country have all fostered a naturally hospitable environment for a sparse population. The Congolese diet provides 102 percent of caloric requirements, although in rural areas, where cassava is the major staple, protein intake is not always sufficient. Safe water is available to about 24 percent of the total population--approximately 40 percent of the urban population, and less than 10 percent of those in rural areas. Despite an infant mortality rate of 112 per 1,000, the population is now growing at a rapid rate of 3 percent annually.

The Congolese have tried to maintain the educational system left to them by the French after independence, and have a historically high literacy rate (variously estimated at between 50 and 80 percent for the adult population). The emphasis on education is high, and many children who do not finish school return as adults to continue their studies. Attendance is high among both male and female students. There are primary schools all over the country, and adjusted primary enrollment, including adult enrollment, was estimated at over 145 percent of the school age population in cities in 1981, with a lower figure in the countryside.

While northern ethnic groups have the upper hand politically, there is little evidence of systematic tribal, ethnic, racial, or other discrimination intended to economically disadvantage a particular group.

Under the Constitution, women have the same rights as men in the private, political and social domains, and for equal work they are entitled to the same social welfare rights. There is a disparity, however, between salaries for men and women, and women are relegated to a secondary role in society. Five women are members of the central committee and one occupies a high-level government position as Minister of Basic Education and Literacy. In secondary schools increasing numbers of young women are enrolled in technical courses, and university attendance among women continues to rise.

DJIBOUTI

Djibouti is a small, resource-poor developing nation, strategically located at the southern end of the Red Sea. Ethnically, the country is divided among the majority politically dominant ethnic Somalis (Issas), who control the Government, civil service, and armed forces; a substantial minority of Afars; and Arabs, mainly Yemenis, who have a prominent role in commerce.

Political power is shared by an unwritten arrangement in which the President, currently Hassan Gouled Aptidon, is an Issa and the Prime Minister an Afar, with cabinet positions divided among these ethnic groups. Since 1981, as part of the political balancing act, there is a single political party, the Popular Assembly Party. The party central committee selected the single slate of candidates for the National Assembly elections held in May 1982.

Djibouti has its own armed forces, including a small army, but security of the country is also assured by the continued presence of 4,000-4,500 French troops, including one unit of the French Foreign Legion.

Despite its meager resources, Djibouti continued in 1984 to host refugees from Ethiopia and Somalia, with the assistance of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) and other international relief agencies. In September 1983, the Government concluded with the UNHCR and Ethiopia a plan for voluntary repatriation for the Ethiopian refugees, but serious drought in Ethiopia has hampered full implementation of it. By the end of 1984 over 15,000 Ethiopians had repatriated, either under UNHCR auspices or spontaneously; over 14,000 remain in refugee camps and in the capital city.

The legal system is still in its formative stages. On any topic not yet covered by Djiboutian legislation, the Napoleonic code, a product of the French colonial period, and, to an extent, the Islamic Shari'a generally apply. No further sections of the first Constitution for Djibouti, introduced in 1981, have been issued.

Djibouti's economy rests on the activities of a large foreign expatriate community, the maritime and commercial activities of the port of Djibouti, the airport, and the operation of the Addis Ababa-Djibouti railroad. Recent economic stagnation has been compounded by the refugee burden. Because of Djibouti's almost total lack of resources, the major focus of the Government is on economic development, which is intrinsically tied to foreign economic assistance. Unemployment and underemployment remain major problems. Free enterprise is encouraged in Djibouti's service-oriented economy, and the right of private property and freedom of movement are generally respected. The openness of the society creates an atmosphere in which most citizens feel free to pursue their livelihood without much fear of governmental interference.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There have been no incidents of killing by the Government for apparent political motives since Djibouti became independent in 1977. In December, 1981, the reputed leader of a Somali dissident group was assassinated in Djibouti City. The Djibouti Government arrested several individuals for this crime in late 1982 and announced that it had evidence of foreign complicity, although no country has yet been identified publicly. The Government seems willing and able to prevent or punish killings by security, military, or political forces under its control.

b. Disappearance

No allegations of disappearances have been made in 1984.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, and Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There have been no allegations of cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment in 1984. In past years, however, there have been several allegations of both harassment of political opposition leaders and torture of political opponents. For example, in September 1982, in a television program produced in France, former Prime Minister Ahemd Dini reiterated charges he and others had made previously that political prisoners were being systematically tortured in Djibouti. The Government denied these charges. In March 1983, a former government employee arrested on charges of espionage escaped to France to seek asylum. He told Amnesty International representatives there that he had been systematically tortured during interrogation. There has been no reaction to these charges from the Government, but Amnesty International's 1984 report (covering 1983) mentions the 1983 charge and one other allegation of torture, specifically hanging by the feet and repeated immersion in water.

Prison conditions are said to be minimally adequate. Family members and counsel are permitted access to prisoners, and public health and medical services supervise health conditions in a generally competent manner.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The current system of justice is a mixture of French and Islamic practice. There is no habeas corpus, and preventive detention is permitted. However, prosecutors are required to, and generally do, file charges in an expedient fashion. The most recent major example of arbitrary arrest and imprisonment was the detention of 13 political dissidents in 1981. All were released in 1982.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Both the state security court, established to deal with crime against the security of the state, and ordinary civil and criminal courts permit family members and counsel, though not the general public, to attend trials. The judiciary has remained largely independent of military and executive pressures. However, there were several allegations in 1984 of corruption within the judiciary, including that individuals could arrange favorable judgments in commercial disputes by bribery.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Decree Law No. 8 of June 1980 states that government authorities "may not enter or remain in the domicile of a private individual without his consent and without a legal order," except, among other circumstances, when it is necessary to facilitate the prosecution of persons accused of crimes and when the public order is seriously disturbed. There are reports of noncompliance with this statute, notably in 1981 with the detention of the 13 political dissidents mentioned previously.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

All Djiboutian media are government-owned and support the Government and its policies. Radio/TV Djibouti claims to receive only limited guidance from senior political levels on handling news it presents to the public. There is occasional criticism of the shortcomings of local institutions, some associated with key political and religious figures, and of corrupt and inefficient practices, but not of the central Government. There have been occasional confiscations of foreign publications which contained commentary critical of the Government. The media usually do not carry stories of violence, crime, or ethnic disturbances.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Public meetings require a permit which may be denied for security reasons. The Government permits free association outside the political realm, and there are several independent social, religious, cultural, and commercial organizations.

The right of labor to organize and strike exists, but only a small portion of the work force is unionized. Moreover, the Government has organized the single national labor federation and keeps it under its control and through it, the individual unions. Unions freely maintain relations with recognized international bodies in their fields.

c. Freedom of Religion

Over 96 percent of the population is Muslim, but other religions are permitted to operate freely. Freedom of religious practice and association with coreligionists outside the country is unfettered.

d. Freedom of Movement within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Djiboutians exercise their right to travel freely within and outside their country. Passports are generally freely available. There are no exchange controls.

DJIBOUTI

As many as 40,000 refugees, mainly from Ethiopia, fled to Djibouti during the height of the armed conflict in the Ogaden region. Most of the refugees have received assistance from the international community in the refugee camps of Dikhil and El Sabieh. Several thousand more have spontaneously settled in the capital city. Refugees in the camps are restricted to them and are not able to move freely. Given Djibouti's meager resources and limited opportunities for employment, current government policy is to encourage all refugees to move to refugee camps in the short term and to return to their country of origin in the long term. Over 14,000 refugees remain in Djibouti.

In early 1983, Djibouti, Ethiopia, and the UNHCR agreed to begin a process of voluntary repatriation of refugees in late 1983. About 10,000 persons have since returned under this agreement. It was to have been completed by April 1984, but Ethiopian drought and famine conditions have since slowed the return of refugees and brought in new flows of drought victims from Ethiopia. The continual influx poses serious problems regarding refugee status. In August 1984, following a series of roundups, several hundred persons were deported to Ethiopia. The Djiboutian Government denied the deportees were registered refugees and claimed instead they were illegal aliens whose presence has created tensions with native Djiboutians. In December 1984, 5,000 Ethiopian drought victims seeking relief in Djibouti were deported for lack of proper refugee documentation.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Djibouti is today a one-party state whose leaders and candidates for Parliament are chosen by the leadership of the party, the Popular Assembly Party. The one-party system was instituted in 1981, and the Government detained leaders of the previous opposition and dissidents allegedly attempting to encourage ethnic strife. Traditionally, the Djiboutian Government includes in the ruling cabinet representatives of all the nation's important ethnic groups. However, some Afars complain that the country is run by and for the Issas, who dominate the Government, the armed forces, and the single party. Others complain that tribal and ethnic considerations inhibit appointment of competent administrators.

While citizens are encouraged to become involved in politics and to vote, the party leadership, through a 14-member political bureau, carefully controls and directs all political activity. There is no democratic or nonviolent means for citizens of Djibouti to change their Government.

Over 90 percent of the reported registered voters went to the polls in the May, 1982 elections. There were reports of minor scattered violence on election day, as well as some coercion of voters.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

On at least six occasions since independence, most recently in August 1984, there have been foreign press and other reports alleging human rights violations by the Government. The Government accepted the 1981 human rights investigation request by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. It also cooperated in 1981 with a delegate from Amnesty International who visited Djibouti to investigate charges of torture and death from torture. Amnesty International in its 1984 report (covering 1983) expressed continuing concern about allegations of torture of detainees, including former political refugees who had returned to Djibouti from exile. Freedom House rates Djibouti "partly free."

Two members of an international fact-finding team sponsored by Cultural Survival, a non-profit human rights organization, were expelled from Djibouti in December 1983 after making contacts in the country with private voluntary organizations and refugee officials to investigate reports of involuntary repatriation of refugees.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Djibouti is one of the world's least developed countries and is almost totally lacking in natural resources. Its economy depends on a large French military and expatriate presence and outside donor support, mainly from France and Saudi Arabia. This support is directed toward many aspects of the economy, including education, transportation, and health facilities.

In 1983 the Gross National Product of Djibouti was estimated at $476.50 per capita. However this figure is misleading, given the very high poverty levels in much of the country and the large, well-paid, predominantly French, expatriate community, some 4 percent of the total estimated population of 275,000. For Djibouti citizens, the estimated GNP per capita is $260.00. A 1980 French study estimated that 47 percent of the population earned less that $130 per annum.

Almost one-third of the population lives a nomadic life of bare subsistence in the rural hinterlands of the republic. A United Nations Development Program report of 1980 states that the Djibouti rural population is "probably one of the poorest groups in Eastern Africa," and that "extreme poverty (also) exists in urban environments of Djibouti." Beyond the near total lack of natural resources, two factors contribute significantly to the poverty level: First, practically all commodities are imported for consumption, and prices of even basic staples are extraordinarily high for most of the nonexpatriate population. Second, the high level of unemployment and the shortage of jobs require working members of a family to be economically responsible for nonworking members. An International Monetary Fund (IMF) 1980 report, which uses Djibouti Ministry of Labor statistics, states that more than 50 percent of those seeking employment in 1979 could not find work. Unemployment in 1982 was estimated at 45 percent and underemployment at 33 percent of the work force.

The harsh, hot environment is one of the causes of the low life expectancy of 50 years (1973 statistics) and the high infant mortality rate of 140.7 per thousand. The latter in turn contribute to a relatively high birth rate of three percent per annum. There is limited agricultural potential, and the only large-scale source of locally produced food is fish. The Government has encouraged the population to supplement their diets with fish. Use of the narcotic plant khat is a major economic and social problem, and W.H.O. held a conference in Djibouti on the subject in December 1984.

DJIBOUTI

Water is a scarce commodity and of poor quality in most of the country. There are no surface water sources. The Government has made efforts to truck water to remote areas of the country. An African Development Fund study of September 1979 estimated 51 percent of the population received safe water (53 percent in urban areas, 20 percent in rural areas). Active government-supported assistance efforts to identify and to utilize further water source and storage areas are currently under way.

According to a November 1980 World Bank report, the adult literacy rate in the French language was 17 percent. Primary school enrollment was approximately 21,000 in 1983, an increase of some 320 percent since independence in 1977. The high school enrollment increased from 3,000 to 9,000 during the same period. This increase, with a concomitant rise in the number and quality of educational facilities, reflects the high priority the Djiboutian Government gives to education.

Women are, in theory, politically equal to men. However, as in many Muslim countries, they play a secondary role in public life and none hold high government or legislative positions.

EQUATORIAL GUINEA

Although the 1982 Constitution proclaims Equatorial Guinea to be a democratic, unitary, and republican state, it is in fact under the absolute rule of its President, Teodoro Obiang Nguema Mbasogo, who is constrained only by the necessity to operate within a consensus of top government and tribal leaders.

Equatorial Guinea is a former Spanish colony in central Africa, composed of a continental province (Rio Muni) and an island province (Bioko). The capital, Malabo, is on Bioko. The country's once thriving economy and managerial base were destroyed during the brutal 11-year Macias regime, overthrown in 1979. Civil order has been restored and the terror that characterized the former dictatorship has largely ended. A new Constitution was adopted and local and national assemblies were chosen.

There was no single event in 1984 to focus international attention on human rights in Equatorial Guinea. There was one execution, for a non-political crime. One political detainee, sentenced to die for plotting to assassinate the President in 1983, remains in prison. Sensitivity to the country's international image and a desire to highlight a contrast with the former regime have probably served to curb the worst abuses. Senior officials accused of serious violations have been punished in the past.

The economy of Equatorial Guinea remains in a shambles and the state apparatus is weak and limited in its enforcement ability. The incidence of petty crime, discrimination against minority groups and migrant workers, and general mistreatment of common citizens by minor officials is widespread and shows no sign of abating.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no reports of killings by government authorities during 1984.

b. Disappearance

No information has been received that secret arrests and detentions occur in Equatorial Guinea.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Police methods at low and middle levels often include beatings of prisoners either to extract information or to punish offenders for insolence or disrespect. Mistreatment of prisoners is officially condemned, however, and numerous examples exist of police officials receiving reprimands.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Incidents of arbitrary arrest occur but are not widespread. They are usually committed by lower level officials whose orders are often countermanded in a day or two if they become known to superiors. Arrests without warrants are fairly common, but those arrested are formally charged or released at the police station. There are no reports of people being detained or jailed for expressing dissident views. The absence of print media makes the expression of any written views difficult. Habeas corpus is recognized by the Constitution and may be invoked by those few Guineans well-educated enough and in a position to hire a lawyer. The ordinary Guinean, when arrested, relies upon representations and payments of "fines" made on his behalf by his family, which are often effective, even though taking place outside of the formal legal framework.

The Government in the main cities of Bata and Malabo continues to round up "vagrants" and put them to work for short periods with the sanction of law, but without the benefits of due process to each person arrested. Gainfully employed people who are not carrying identity documents may also be forced to join work gangs for several days before they obtain their release. The frequency and scope of such incidents is linked to the coming and going of important national days and visiting dignitaries. Most work gangs are involved in cutting brush, cleaning the streets, and painting government buildings.

Another widespread practice includes the rounding up of "illegal" aliens, mostly Cameroonians, Nigerians, Ghanaians, and Senegalese who may be forced to work on cacao plantations owned by government officials. This practice is more prevalent during the cacao harvest and seems linked to the shortages of willing labor on the island of Bioko.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Twenty-six persons were tried in 1983 for plotting to kill the President and overthrow the Government. The three principal defendants were convicted and sentenced to death. Two of these were executed in 1983 and the third remains in prison, pending government review of his case. There is still no information available on the verdicts given to the 23 others. Amnesty International, in its 1984 Report, expressed concern that the trial of the 26 may not have been conducted in accordance with internationally recognized standards for a fair trial.

The current court system is a combination of traditional, civil, and military justice, which often operates in an ad hoc manner for lack of established procedures and experienced judicial personnel. Most trials are speedy. In cases of petty theft or civil dispute, all parties are brought before a judge who listens, questions, and then most often sets a fine to be paid by one party to the other. Fines may also be levied in lieu of imprisonment in cases against the State. In one notable case, a ranking official was accused of issuing Guinean diplomatic passports to North Koreans. The official in question was heavily fined and banished to his home village for six years. Exclusion from public office and banishment are popular means of dealing with ranking offenders.

The Ministry of Justice continues to work on structuring the judiciary and establishing a legal system. A major government-sponsored conference/lecture series on the judiciary and the Constitution was well attended. There were no major court cases during the past year to put the independence of the judicial system to the test. It is widely believed, however, that any court case interesting enough to attract international attention would be conducted in a relatively open atmosphere. The 1983 trial was open to the public.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

There have been no confirmed reports of arbitrary interference with privacy, home, or correspondence. Many people suspect that telephone conversations are routinely monitored. It is doubtful that search warrants are used, as provided for in the Constitution.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

What little communications media exist in Equatorial Guinea are government owned and operated. The single newspaper published only one issue in 1984. The radio and television stations, when operating, transmit official government notices and imported entertainment, sports and religious programs. The officially-controlled media do not criticize the Government. Direct criticism is never heard in speeches made in public forums but is frequently heard in private conversation.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Government does not prohibit private associations, but membership in any type of opposition organization would probably result in the loss of official employment and exclusion from the ruling circles from which all benefits and privileges are derived. Non-political groups such as professional organizations and sports groups do exist and may receive government backing. There have been no attempts to form any type of labor union, and given the country's minuscule industrial and disorganized agricultural sector, little scope for union activity exists.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is freedom of religion in Equatorial Guinea. No religion is favored, but the Catholic religion is dominant. Religious publishing is permitted. Missionaries of several faiths are active and have government permission for their activities. Proselytizing is permitted. There does not appear to be any discrimination against persons on the basis of their faith.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no known restrictions on Equatorial Guineans with respect to travel within the country. Travel abroad is limited by shortages of foreign exchange. There are also often delays in the issuance of exit visas, but those delays do not seem to be politically motivated. Few Guineans currently seek refuge outside the country, but a large number of exiles continue to reside in Spain, Cameroon, and Gabon. Many exiles criticize the Government as being tribally based and undemocratic, but most probably remain abroad for economic reasons. The Government has repeatedly proclaimed the freedom of all Guineans to return and promises that returnees need not fear persecution. It would expect those returning not to engage in political activities outside the current system. One recently returned opposition political leader has apparently been allowed to reintegrate without major difficulties. There is only one foreign refugee, from Cape Verde, known to have sought asylum in Equatorial Guinea.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

President Obiang was confirmed in office in 1982 following a plebiscite which ratified a new Constitution. The plebiscite did not expressly permit a vote for president, but rather only approval or disapproval of the Constitution itself, which established a seven-year term of office for the president. Obiang interpreted the constitutional referendum as a mandate to rule for seven years, and consequently will not face reelection until 1989 under the present system. The law does not indicate what the ground rules of that election will be.

Under the Constitution a partially elected, partially appointed National Assembly is chosen. Representation in the Assembly includes members of minority groups. The Constitution provides for members of the Assembly to freely voice dissenting views, but the Assembly's role in formulating policies which differ from those approved by the President and Council of Ministers has not been demonstrated.

No formal opposition groups operate within the country, but opposition leaders do exist and maintain ties with exile groups in Spain. The scope for any organized political opposition remains extremely narrow at this time. The Fang tribe, which comprises more than 70 percent of the population, dominates the Government, but some Fang sub-groups maintain that they are underrepresented. Similarly, the Bubi tribe, which comprises a small percentage of the population, but has historically been the majority on the island of Bioko, where Malabo is located, also claims underrepresentation.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The President is sensitive to international criticism of his Government and concerned to prevent the occurrence of incidents that would portray his regime in a bad light. The President is often quick to address official complaints lodged by members of the diplomatic community on behalf of their nationals. The commitment at the higher levels of Government, however, is not sufficient to stop the abuses and discriminations that occur widely at the lower levels. Freedom House rates Equatorial Guinea "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The economy in Equatorial Guinea shows little sign, after five years, of recovery from the devastation and anarchy of the Macias regime. While government institutions have been reactivated, schools reopened, and dozens of development projects initiated, there seems to be little significant progress. Roads, rebuilt several years ago, deteriorate with each rainy season. Food is no more available in the markets now than in 1981, and prices continue to rise. Cacao production, the mainstay of the economy, has only partially recovered and seems to have hit a plateau due to limited foreign exchange for the importation of agricultural improvements. The problems of lack of willing local labor and trained management have not been successfully addressed.

Health services have improved somewhat due to the continued presence of a large number of foreign aid medical personnel, though equipment and medicines remain scarce. Foreign aid has helped add variety to the local staples of plantains and yams, but malnutrition, particularly among children, remains high. The 1984 population is 275,000 with a growth rate of 2.5 percent. Life expectancy at birth is 44 years and the infant mortality rate is 134 per 1,000 live births. Primary school enrollment (1973) was 88 percent of males, 71 percent of females, or 79 percent of all children. The adult literacy rate is about 60 percent. Per capita gross national product figures are unavailable but are variously estimated at between $100-200. The average Guinean lives at the subsistence level, though members of the bureaucracy and better educated people living in the larger towns live at something better than subsistence. The diet for nearly all Guineans is heavily dependent on locally available root and fruit crops, supplemented occasionally with game and some fish.

Most salaried employment is with the Government. Minority groups complain that they are discriminated against in government employment. Discrimination that is prevalent in the top levels of Government in the allocation of politically sensitive positions probably carries over into the lower bureaucracy. While substantial numbers of people from all tribes and sub-tribes are employed at all levels of the government, certain Fang sub-groups, Bubi, and Rio Muni coastal tribes may be underrepresented.

The law states that both sexes, and all tribal groups, are equal and entitled to the same rights and privileges. For a variety of reasons, some historical and cultural and others economic, women are accorded a lower status than men and have a correspondingly lower status and influence in the society and government. Men often take several wives but women are never permitted multiple husbands. Social tradition, and the fact that women produce most of the basic staple food items, keep most women engaged in agricultural or domestic work. Five times as many males as females enter secondary school and eight times as many graduate at this level. Because of the severe need for skilled people of all types, however, women can have professional careers and do hold important jobs in the health sector and in other socially oriented ministries.

ETHIOPIA

Ultimate power in Ethiopia, wielded by Chairman Mengistu Haile-Mariam and a small group of former military associates, continues to be exercised and maintained through intimidation and arbitrary arrest. The country is without civil or political freedoms and without institutions or laws to protect its citizens' human rights. The Provisional Military Government of Socialist Ethiopia (PMGSE) maintains complete control over the media, labor, education, internal and external movements of Ethiopian citizens, and all political processes.

Persons expressing opposition to the regime or who are believed not to support it are routinely arrested by security police and subjected to torture in varying degrees; some executions have been reported as well. The individual citizen enjoys no legal protection and may be detained at any time, without explanation and be held indefinitely without any prospect of trial. For example, as many as 1,000 low and mid-level Ethiopian government officials and business or government-affiliated organization members were arrested in Addis Ababa during June, July, and August.

The Government's control over the population is being strengthened through the establishment of the Workers' Party of Ethiopia. Formally declared on September 6, 1984, it is the sole legal political party and its membership is carefully selected. Mengistu holds the top post of secretary-general and the military retains strong control in the party, whose goal is to help transform the country into a Marxist-Leninist state. Marxist-Leninist ideology has already been imposed in the press, throughout the educational system, the "kebele" (urban neighborhood association) network, and increasingly, in the military and workplace. A comprehensive system of surveillance and informants has been set in place by the regime.

There was continued armed conflict in 1984 between the Government and insurgent forces in Eritrea, Tigray, the Ogaden, and other regions. In addition, there are signs of growing rebellion among the Oromo people, Ethiopia's largest ethnic group. The Government has endorsed military solutions and has not been ready to offer significant political compromise to meet demands of the various regions. The continued fighting has perpetuated massive human rights violations by both the Government and insurgent forces against the civilian population in the war zones. Bombing and shelling of suspected guerrilla positions in populated areas by Ethiopian forces, together with frequent infighting between rival factions within the dissident groups, continued to produce civilian casualties and dislocations in the contested areas.

In the economic sphere, serious drought and the effects of the regime's discouragement of private agriculture caused even more acute food shortages in 1984 than in 1983. There was widespread famine in much of the country's northern areas and in some parts of the south. Some six to seven million persons were seriously affected. By October, hundreds were dying daily of starvation in Welo region, and probably as many or more were perishing in neighboring Tigray. Nevertheless, all during the summer months as the famine gathered momentum, the Government of Ethiopia was preoccupied with the organization of the Worker's Party and preparation for the 10th anniversary of the revolution, on which tens of millions of dollars were lavished. It did not adequately coordinate with donors on the increasingly serious food shortages until the 10th anniversary celebrations were past.

In November, the Ethiopian Government embarked on a massive resettlement scheme, starting an initial movement of 70,000 people, with plans to transfer a total of 1.5 million from drought affected northern areas of Ethiopia to new settlements in the western part of the country. Besides directing much needed resources from the desperate famine relief effort in the north, this endeavor has been opposed by most Western donor nations on human rights grounds. There has been minimal preparation for arrival of new settlers in resettlement areas. There are reports from observers in Ethiopia that the resettlement has not been voluntary or that the people have been desperate and starving, with no real choice. There are charges that the Government is using resettlement for political purposes to disperse local opposition to the regime centered in the north. More than 120,000 people had reportedly been resettled by the end of 1984. Another 100,000 Ethopians had fled to Sudan in 1984 to escape the drought and often also to escape forced resettlement.

Ethiopia, with a population of over 40 million, continues to have one of the lowest per capita incomes in the world ($140). The vast majority of Ethiopians live with inadequate housing, water, sanitation, and medical facilities. The Government has so far been unwilling to reduce its sizable military spending to increase relief or development efforts. More than one million Ethiopians remained outside the country, the result of years of war, drought, poverty, civil strife, and oppression. Human rights prospects for the future remain bleak.

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Widespread politically motivated executions of dissidents, suspected "feudal sympathizers," and other "anti-revolutionaries" that occurred following the revolution, and especially during the "white terror" and "red terror" period of 1977-78, ended during the 1980's in areas outside insurgency regions. However, from time to time during 1984 there were reports of such summary executions. In the insurgency areas, political killings by both government forces and the various involved factions continued. Insurgency forces use assassination, sniping, and the mining of roadways as tactics against the Government and its sympathizers while the Government continues to execute opposition forces' members, bomb civilian population centers, and destroy homes and crops in rebel-held areas.

b. Disappearance

Sudden apprehension and detention of persons suspected of anti-regime activities or merely lack of sympathy with the regime continued to be practiced by the Government. As in previous years, there were in 1984 documented cases of Ethiopians being abducted without charge by plain-clothes security police and held incommunicado for extended periods. Families are not notified of their relatives' arrest or, if they are, frequently not informed of their whereabouts. Prisoners also have been known to disappear from their jail cells, never to be seen again. Six Ethiopian employees of the United Nations Economic Commission for Africa, headquartered in Addis Ababa, were abducted several years ago by Ethiopian police and are yet to be accounted for; one is reported to have died in police custody. Amnesty International in its 1984 report (covering 1983) expressed concern over the regime's continued failure to account for some 15 political prisoners who disappeared in 1979.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

It is generally believed that torture is applied less extensively now than it was in the 1970's. However, there are no legal provisions safeguarding the Ethiopian population from torture, or cruel or inhuman treatment or punishment by government personnel and institutions. There were unconfirmed reports in early 1984 of political prisoners suffering severe injury, leading to their deaths, following cruel interrogation practices. Torture, including severe beatings, crushing of bones of the hand, and electric shocks, is reported to be practiced in cases involving insurgent combatants and those engaged in activities, such as statements or writings, against the Government.

Amnesty International states that torture is often practiced on Ethiopian prisoners interrogated at the Central Revolutionary Investigation Department ("Third Police Station") in the capital and routinely is used in other parts of the country to interrogate prisoners about opposition organizations, especially those engaged in armed conflict against the Government.

At an interrogation center in Nazareth where political prisoners are brought, torture is commonly practiced and the possibility is ever present that torture or ill-treatment will be used against the detainee or his family or friends. Uncertain periods of imprisonment and lack of access to family are other forms of cruel and unusual treatment. In many cases the detainee is not informed of the reason for his or her incarceration or the length of time he will remain imprisoned.

Prison conditions in Ethiopia continue to be, in the great majority of cases, extremely poor. Cells and detention areas are damp, overcrowded, and unheated. Sanitation facilities are inadequate. Prisoners must rely upon their families to provide food and in some cases are denied changes of clothing. Family visits are limited or sometimes denied.

Conditions in one of the main detention centers in the capital, where members of the royal family and other political prisoners are held, are said to be reasonably good. Occupational and academic training is available, and books and magazines are provided. Families and friends are allowed to visit with reasonable frequency. Former prisoners held at the Gebi Palace prison, below Mengistu's offices, have reported that they were relatively well treated, though their quarters were crowded and damp, and brief visits by family members were allowed only once a year. Those held were mostly high-ranking officials from the former Government. There is no evidence that political prisoners are subjected to living conditions worse than those of convicted criminals.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Ethiopians suspected of anti-government actions or sentiments are subject to arrest or detention without charge or judicial review. During the months preceding the September party founding congress and celebration of the 10th anniversary of the Ethiopian revolution, possibly as many as 1,000 Ethiopians, the majority ethnic Eritreans and Tigreans, were rounded up in Addis Ababa and held without charge, presumably due to suspected dissident group sympathies or associations. In many, if not most, cases, political detainees are held incommunicado, at least initially and sometimes during the entire length of their arbitrary term of incarceration. There are no legal provisions in these cases for the reading of charges to the detainee. Rights to counsel and the opportunity to face one's accusers are nonexistent. A writ of habeas corpus on the country's statutes has not been successfully invoked in any known case. The term of confinement for a suspect held without legal charge is subject to the whims of the incarcerators who can be from any level of government, from the politburo down to the local kebele. Prisoners have been held for a few months or up to nine years.

Remarks considered critical or derisive of the Government, failure to attend mandatory political or kebele meetings, suspicion of association or sympathy with organizations opposed to the Government and, in the case of Ethiopian women, suspicion of sexual liaison with foreign visitors in public hostelries, are all reasons for arbitrary arrest and detention.

In February, the Government announced that it had been holding 18 persons in detention since December 1983 for "distributing anti-revolutionary pamphlets." The fate of the 18 is unknown. In politically sensitive arrests, the Government generally prefers to operate in secret, taking the suspect at home at night. However, arbitrary arrest is not limited to the politically suspect. It is commonplace for people with no record of political activity or political beliefs to be arrested and detained for months or longer with no explanation ever being given. In one case, the family of a person arrested in early February 1984 was told by prison officials some two weeks after the arrest that he had been found innocent--of what, it was not specified--and would be released soon. Despite repeated appeals by the family and assurances by prison officials that he was considered innocent and would be released "soon," he was still under detention as of mid-October 1984. In September, the Government announced its customary revolution anniversary political prisoner release. The names of the 96 detainees released were not announced, though it has been learned that the list included several officers of the former ruling military council (the Dergue) and excluded the remaining imprisoned royal family members.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

There is no discernible separation between the executive branch and the judiciary. Courts are subject to political control, and are responsive to the requirements of Ethiopia's leadership.

Ordinary criminal and civil cases are more generally based upon the submission of evidence in a public setting. Minor cases are tried at the kebele level while more serious criminal accusations are tried in courts where the accused has access to court-appointed lawyers.

Ethiopian political prisoners generally do not receive trials, public or otherwise. No guarantee of a public trial with counsel exists, nor is the accused permitted to present witnesses or evidence in his or her defense. Political trials are almost always held in secret with only the verdict (if released at all) publicly announced. Prisoners cleared of charges or whose terms have been completed are not always released from prisons.

There are conflicting reports about the current number of political prisoners, which is virtually impossible to estimate. If the total includes those taken prisoner as a result of ethnic insurgencies, it could well number in the thousands. Amnesty International believes thousands are still being held without trial or charges.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Warrants are not required for entry into or search of offices or private homes in Ethiopia. As a result, forced entry is a common method of the police and security forces, although the level of this activity is currently much lower than during the "red terror" period of 1977-78. But surveillance of individuals, both visual or through listening devices, has increased and operates with no legal strictures.

All mail is monitored by the Government. Ethiopian citizens can be called out at any time for questioning by authorities, mandatory kebele meetings, or non-voluntary political rallies or marches. Refusal to show up for any of the above can be punishable by imprisonment without hearing. Every Ethiopian lives under the watchful eye of local kebele or rural dwellers' association officials, who monitor visitors received, items being brought in and out of houses, meetings taking place, and adherence to the midnight to 5:00 a.m. curfew. These local officials are empowered to arrest anyone whom they deem guilty of illegal or suspicious conduct. Ethiopian citizens are often forced to join "mass" organizations, and it is reported that many who joined the party did so because they were forced to join.

Foreign radio broadcasts such as the VOA and BBC are widely listened to in Ethiopia, and there is no evidence of overt efforts by the Government to interfere.

ETHIOPIA

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

There is no freedom of speech or press in Ethopia. The Government has complete ownership and operation of all information media and exercises censorship through editorial boards and the cultural ministry. Expression of political opinion which is unauthorized or at variance with the official government line is strictly forbidden. Political, economic, and social policy in Ethiopia is formulated at top levels of government, then disseminated through the government-controlled media and government-organized citizens' groups, i.e., women's, youth, workers', and peasants associations, kebeles, and military commissariats. Opinion expressed contrary to the government line can, and often does, result in imprisonment without charge or sentence. Books and magazines can be confiscated if they are deemed counter to the revolution.

The pronouncements of public officials, academics, and clergy are closely monitored by the Government. Surveillance of public opinion is implemented through official guidelines for thought and by a widespread system of informants within government offices, schools, businesses, the military, and the university.

Some instructors and professors in secondary schools and at the university have resisted the politicization of education. Academic freedom, although circumscribed, especially in political and social sciences, still finds limited expression at the university. Private secondary schools, where Ethiopians who can afford them send their children, are mostly free of political orientation. Many, including people in the Government, seek to send their children abroad for education.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Assembly of any sort that has not been approved by the Government is strictly forbidden under penalty of arrest. In contrast, attendance at government-backed rallies, meetings, and parades is mandatory and enforceable by arrest and detention.

Ethiopians are cautious in their associations with each other and with foreigners. A system of informants and surveillance is pervasive. Frequent association with foreigners can result in questioning, arrest, and detention.

Formation of political groups outside government-organized bodies like the youth, women's, and peasant associations is illegal and is dealt with harshly. Professional associations such as the Rotary and Lions Clubs are allowed to operate, though it can be assumed that their membership and activities are monitored by the Government.

Labor is not permitted to organize independently in Ethiopia. Labor-management negotiations are not allowed. Strikes or slowdowns are strictly forbidden. The only labor organization allowed to operate is the government-controlled All-Ethiopia Trade Union (AETU). The AETU is one of Ethiopia's "mass organizations" and is basically a political group, utilized by the Government to implement its policies, expand party control into the workplace, prevent work stoppages, and to keep the labor force in line. A number of AETU's top leadership have been trained in the Eastern bloc, and the organization has close ties with Soviet and East European labor organizations.

The Government uses both convict and forced kebele labor. Prisoners used in various construction projects, such as road building and forestation, reportedly are criminal convicts such as murderers, robbers and, as widely reported in the press, those found guilty of corruption. Kebele dwellers, young and old, male and female, are obligated to "volunteer" their services for work programs upon the demand of kebele officials. Those with proof of employment or the funds to pay a bribe generally escape such mandatory tasks, which the poor and unemployed have little chance of avoiding.

c. Freedom of Religion

With the overthrow of the Haile Selassie regime, the Ethiopian Orthodox ("Coptic") Church lost its favored position, along with its lands and most of its property. The Government allows the Orthodox church and the Muslim religion (each claims to make up about 50 percent of Ethiopia's population) freedom of worship and proselytism. However, the Orthodox church has government-appointed officials within its administration to ensure its conformity.

Orthodox and Muslim holidays are recognized by the Government, and officials of both religions are allowed to exercise jurisdiction over civil matters such as marriages. There is, however, a continuing effort to de-emphasize the presence and importance of religion in Ethiopian life. References to deity are expunged from dialogue in television programs and movies, and forbidden in government statements or publications. Often, obligatory seminars for youth have been organized on Sunday mornings in conflict with religious observance. During the weeks preceding the traditional Orthodox pilgrimage to Kulubi in late 1983, the Government restricted bus allocations, train schedules, and gasoline rationing. When the unpopularity of this move among the Ethiopian public became apparent, the Government backed off, but the disruption caused a lower attendance level than in previous years. The Government has not interfered so openly in 1984.

Other religions, particularly Western Protestant evangelical organizations, have found their activities sharply curtailed by the Government, through the closure of churches, the seizure and nationalization of property and facilities, and harassment and surveillance. At least one organization's congregation now assembles in secret "safe areas" for worship and other church-related meetings. The Government does allow some limited missionary activity; it gives permits to foreign missionaries to enter and work in Ethiopia in limited numbers. Amnesty International's 1984 report notes that over 30 officials of the Ethopian Evangelical Mekane Yesus Church had been imprisoned for their non-violent beliefs.

There has been considerable illegal emigration by Ethiopian Jews (Falasha) during 1984, continuing a trend of previous years. Legal emigration is greatly restricted. Access by foreign Jewish and Israeli visitors to Falasha villages in the Gondar region was shut off for most of 1984, although reopened to some extent in December. There had been many such visits in 1983. Ethiopian authorities apparently suspected that foreign Jewish and Israeli visitors provided Ethiopian Jews money and encouragement to leave the country. They may also hope to prevent the outside world from learning of the frictions that continue to mark government relations with the Ethiopian Jewish community, resulting from government efforts to prevent emigration (emigration is forbidden by law to all Ethiopians), lack of Hebrew instruction, and the resistance of Ethiopian Jews to Marxist-Leninist indoctrination. Ethiopian Jews are situated in areas of insurgency (Tigray, Gondar) in which they frequently get caught in the crossfire. However, stories of "genocidal" actions by Ethiopian authorities, or of highly brutal behavior, appear unfounded.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

In November 1984, the Government began a massive and forced resettlement scheme to move more than 1.5 million persons from the drought affected north to the western part of the country. The people being resettled are moved from a highland environment to lowlands where they are susceptible to malaria and other parasitic diseases unfamiliar to them. They have been placed in the midst of ethnically, culturally, and linguistically different populations who regard them as intruders. There are reports that many attempt to flee back to their home areas and that those who are unsuccessful are returned to resettlement areas under armed guard. Families being resettled are nuclear, comprised only of husband, wife (not over age 35-40) and children. The elderly and sick are left behind.

Other restrictions on freedom of travel within Ethiopia exist as a result of the insurgency (several areas, mainly in the northern administrative zones, are closed for security reasons). Moreover, permission is required for Ethiopian citizens to change their places of residence, and persons considered politically suspect may be forbidden to travel outside their home areas.

Travel for Ethiopians outside their country is heavily restricted by the Government. Issuance of a passport can be denied for failure to attend the mandatory Sunday morning political meeting or to "volunteer" for kebele work activities. It is not unusual for bribes to be solicited. Government policy regarding the issuance of travel documents is subject to sudden and arbitrary change. During late 1983 and through 1984, issuance of external travel permits to Ethiopians was occasionally shut off with no warning, then suddenly renewed within a short period of time. Military-age Ethiopians (between the ages of 16 and 30) have a particularly difficult time obtaining external travel permits and passports.

Emigration remains strictly forbidden to Ethiopian citizens except in very special and limited circumstances such as marriage to or adoption by a foreign national.

ETHIOPIA

Unauthorized flight from Ethiopia is regarded by the Government as a serious offense punishable by 5 to 25 years imprisonment or, reportedly in exceptional cases, death. There is nonetheless considerable illegal emigration, undertaken either under the subterfuge of travel abroad for business or to visit relatives, or by arduous treks overland and surreptitious crossing of the border.

The Government recognizes the right of voluntary repatriation, and its proclamation of mass amnesty for those Ethiopians living abroad (numbering more than one million) remains in effect. To date, more than 10,000 Ethiopians have returned from Djibouti, and many ethnic Somalis have returned as well, though estimates of their exact numbers vary from 100,000 to as many as 320,000. Small numbers have also returned from Sudan.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Ethiopian citizens have no legal right or means to change their Government or to affect decisions. All power to decide policy in Ethiopia resides in the upper echelons of Government, led by Chairman Mengistu and a small group of former military officers. Political thought, economic policy, and public opinion are dictated to the population. The Provisional Military Government of Socialist Ethiopia invariably claims to be speaking on behalf of the whole Ethiopian people. The new Workers' Party of Ethiopia purports to offer Ethiopian citizens a means of participation in government, but its role is still unclear, and candidates for party positions are carefully screened and serve to rubber-stamp government decisions and help propagate the Marxist-Leninist system. The various other "mass organizations" are also government controlled and directed. Kebeles and peasants' associations, which are the primary government control mechanism at the local level, control people's movements, housing allocation, basic food rationing, political indoctrination, and implement other government policies, such as registering youths for national military service.

The highest echelons of the Government are no longer dominated by the Amhara ethnic group but includes many Oromos, and some Eritreans and Tigreans. Almost all senior government and political figures are of Christian origin although the population is 50 percent Muslim. Women are very poorly represented at the top echelons of government. Only one woman holds a senior position at the level of Vice-Minister.

There have been no concrete developments on the autonomy question for Ethiopia's various ethnic groups, and the insurgencies in the predominantly Eritrean, Tigrean, and Oromo areas of Ethiopia continue.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

There is no government or private body to investigate alleged human rights violations, although various organizations are permitted to make statements on human rights in South Africa.

The Government opposes any attempt by international and non-governmental organizations to investigate such allegations. Representatives of the International Committee of the Red Cross in Addis Ababa are not allowed to visit political prisoners, only prisoner of war internment centers. Freedom House rates Ethiopia "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Ethiopia's first census indicates that its diverse population is 40-42 million (contrasting with a 1984 World Bank previous estimate of 32 million). This would put Ethiopia's per capita income (estimated by World Bank in 1982 at about $141) among the lowest in the world and well below the poverty line. Of the more than 40 different groups, the Amhara, Tigreans, and Oromo make up more than three-fourths of the population. Approximately 85 percent of the population is rural and the majority of this population resides over half a day's walk from an all-weather road. According to a May 1984 World Bank report, during the decade ending 1982/83, Ethiopia's GDP grew at an average rate of 2.2 percent annually against an annual population growth rate of more than 2.5 percent. The rate of under- and unemployment in Ethiopia's cities and villages is reportedly around 50 percent.

Ethiopia's development problems are considerable and growing in scope. The chronic drought problem is worsening. Famine has reached crisis proportions in several areas of the country, and the number of Ethiopians affected by food shortages, including in the capital, reportedly ranges from six to seven million. Indications are that famine has already reached a scale equal to or beyond that of the 1973-74 famine which resulted in approximately 200,000 deaths and contributed to the downfall of Haile Selassie.

Agricultural production has suffered not only from the drought, but also importantly from ideological constraints. State farms and collectivization schemes have been given high priority but have consistently shown poor results. Price and distribution controls on agricultural products act as a disincentive to increased food production. In early September 1984, kebele officials seized "hoarded" supplies of teff from private shop owners to make up for shortages of government-issued grain rations.

Industrial production, in the face of overcentralization of the economy, is stagnating, with growth impeded by spare parts shortages (due to chronic foreign exchange problems), managerial inefficiency, shortages of capital investment, and government ownership of almost all industrial facilities.

Huge military expenditures take upwards of 40 percent of Ethiopia's national budget. The Government's pursuit of a military solution to the continuing insurgencies in the northern regions of the country makes it likely that military expenditure will remain at this very high level. Ethiopia's standing army is the largest in Africa south of the Sahara.

Despite serious drought and famine in many areas of the country, the Ethiopian Government in 1984 spent large sums on building construction, extra security, and general refurbishing of Addis Ababa in preparation for the September Workers' Party of Ethiopia Founding Congress and the celebration of the 10th anniversary of the revolution. Estimates of these expenditures ranged upwards of $20 million.

The Government has attempted to increase medical services to the peasantry and urban poor, but the magnitude of the country's infrastructural and financial problems have made this effort inadequate to the total need. There is no evidence that last year's statistics of 1 doctor per 75,000 persons and 1 nurse per 5,320 persons have changed significantly. Infectious disease is rampant, including leprosy, tuberculosis, and trachoma. Only six percent of the population had access to safe water in 1976. Lines at water pumps are common in the poorer areas of Addis Ababa, and open ditches are commonly used as sewers. The infant mortality rate is high (172 out of every 1,000 births).

The Government has expanded access to educational facilities for the rural and urban poor (the primary school enrollment ratio reportedly increased from 19 to 46 percent between 1973 and 1981). As a result, the literacy rate has risen from approximately 6 per cent before the revolution to the currently claimed level of 54 per cent. The World Bank cited a 15 per cent literacy rate in the late 1970s. Recent figures (government statistical abstract for 1981) showed 1,386,648 males and 744,068 females in grades 1-6, and 135,708 males and 25,013 females in grades 7-8. University enrollment has been expanded considerably and now stands at about 12,000 day students and over 8,000 extension students. Ethnic Oromo students have been given opportunities for advanced studies that were largely unavailable under the previous regime. A quota system allows students from the outlying regions entrance into the universities even if their test scores are lower than those of their counterparts in Addis Ababa or other cities.

A United Nations study published in 1980 concluded that "women are discriminated against under marriage laws, in their participation in political and civic affairs, and in terms of equal educational opportunity and receiving wages equal to those of men." A 1982 UNICEF study also concluded that Ethiopian women are among the most disadvantaged sectors of the population, citing cultural and traditional biases, marriages imposed at a very young age, the hard and time-consuming labor of rural women, and inadequate employment opportunities and decent wages for urban women. Village leadership is male, and all clergy are male. However, women in the central Ethiopian cultures (Oromo, Amhara, Tigre) enjoy economic rights equal to those of men. They may inherit, sell, or buy property and engage in business. Women have a subjugated status within the home, and child marriages remain common in some rural areas despite opposition by the Government. Female circumcision is practiced in the northern parts of the country although the Government has stated its opposition to this practice.

The Revolutionary Ethiopian Women's Association (REWA), a "mass organization" created in 1980, has the proclaimed goal of improving the status of women. Its plans include vocational training courses, increased employment and education for women, and programs to rehabilitate prostitutes. REWA claims that 3.2 million women have benefited from the literacy campaign and that many laws discriminatory against women are being eliminated. Since customs and practices are difficult to overcome, REWA's main focus has been to educate, organize, and encourage women to participate fully in authorized economic and political activities. At the same time, because the organization is controlled by the party, it also is heavily engaged in political indoctrination programs.

GABON

Gabon is a developing country with a single-party political system in which effective political power is concentrated in the Presidency. This office has been held since 1967 by President Omar Bongo, who was reconfirmed in office in 1973 and 1979 in uncontested elections. A March 1983 amendment to the constitution of the country's only legal political party restricts candidacy in future presidential elections to the "Secretary General-Founder of the Democratic Party of Gabon," thus reserving presidential candidacy for the current incumbent, President Bongo. In practice presidential power is somewhat limited by the increasing complexity of government and the diffusion of power through a 54-member Cabinet headed by a Prime Minister.

A 93-member National Assembly elected from slates chosen by the single party meets regularly, but it has little real power. While opposition parties are not permitted, there have been cases in past years where local or parliamentary elections were contested and won by party members who were not supported by the party hierarchy.

The country's Constitution guarantees protection of the individual and respect for the integrity of the person. While there have been reports of isolated exceptions, these rights are generally respected in practice. A legal system based upon French civil law, customary law, and the 1961 Constitution functions fairly effectively. Political rights, however, are not guaranteed under the Constitution, and active political opposition is not permitted. Public criticism of particular government actions and policies is allowed and occurs with some regularity within the context of the single party, although direct attacks on the President are prohibited.

There is no evidence of systematic police or other repression of the population. The security forces are divided into several distinct and autonomous groups of varying effectiveness. While two or three of the services have an internal political intelligence role, the security forces do not as a rule interfere in the daily life of the population.

Although still a developing country, Gabon has the highest per capita income ($4000) in sub-Saharan Africa due to its important petroleum and mineral resources and relatively small population. Economic performance has also benefited from long-standing government policies supporting private enterprise and encouraging foreign investment. While income distribution is skewed in favor of the modern urban sector as opposed to the traditional, agricultural sector, most Gabonese have benefited in some measure from the country's strong economy.

There was no significant change in the human rights situation in Gabon in 1984. An estimated 14 - 20 persons are imprisoned for opposition political activity.

GABON

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no known political killings or summary executions.

b. Disappearance

There were no known or reported cases of abductions or hostage-taking by government or non-government groups. The authorities are sometimes slow to advise the families of accused criminals or detainees who are arrested, but there has been no evidence of attempts to suppress news of an arrest.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

A 1984 Amnesty International report contained allegations of torture of some political prisoners. No other such reports have been received. The political opposition group, the Movement for National Recovery (Morena), based in Paris, has alleged that several people detained in the Libreville prison on political charges have been mistreated or kept in degrading conditions. There are other reports, however, that virtually all prisoners are allowed family visits, and family members report no serious mistreatment. Amnesty's 1984 report also mentions allegations that some prisoners, both criminal and political, were held in chains for considerable periods as a form of punishment. Police are believed to be rough but not brutal in their treatment of suspected criminals. Prison conditions are harsh.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

In Gabon, "acts against the security of the state" and "actions against the chief of state," which can include advocating a multiparty system, are punishable crimes. Approximately 10 members or alleged members of the Morena opposition group are currently in prison on such charges; most were detained for several months before being brought to trial in 1982 and 1983. There have been no reports of detention without trial of persons accused of violations of criminal law. Gabonese law, amended in September 1983 and ratified by the National Assembly early in 1984, provides for up to six months of "preventive detention", on a judge's order, of suspected criminals. Previously, there was no upper limit.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

In 1983 four political dissidents were given non-public trials, with defense attorneys present, and sentenced to four-year prison terms. Their trial contrasted with the November 1982 public proceedings, with representatives of the international press and Amnesty International present, at which 29 dissidents were given prison sentences of from one to 20 years; the period of pre-trial detention from December 1981 to November 1982 was credited against the sentences, leading to the early release of five prisoners with sentences of eighteen months or less. (Seven more were released in March 1983, when President Bongo reduced all sentences by five years. For the 17 remaining of the original group, sentences were reduced another five years in 1984; one more prisoner was then released. Nine prisoners were granted conditional release by presidential decree during December 1984.) There have been a few reports that the number of persons in prison for political opposition may be around 20, but firm information is available only on the 17 Morena members who were tried and initially sentenced to 4 to 20 years. The longest sentences have now been reduced to 10 years. Following the most recent release of prisoners, there are now believed to be no more than 7 of the Morena prisoners still incarcerated. Their crimes were printing and distribution of anti-government tracts, and allegedly encouraging the Government of France to use its influence in Gabon to bring about a multiparty political system. No political trials were reported in 1984.

Gabon's Constitution specifies that the President has the authority to appoint, transfer, and dismiss judicial officials.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

There has been no evidence of significant abuses by the Government in this area. The various police and security units monitor dissident political activity and do have the capability to monitor telephone conversations, but interference in the daily life of the populace is relatively rare.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

There are certain limits on these rights in Gabon: no direct public criticism of President Bongo is permitted, and no advocacy of a multiparty political system by the media or individuals is tolerated. The country's single daily newspaper, which is government-owned, regularly prints columns attacking alleged inefficiency or corruption in various government offices. Foreign magazines and newspapers, notably French publications and magazines printed elsewhere in Africa, which sometimes criticize the President and the one-party system, generally circulate freely in Gabon, although occasional issues of particular publications are seized by the police. Journalists are considered to be state employees and are expected to expound on themes as directed by the Government.

The policies of the Government have been debated in public forums in the past. The President and his key ministers have submitted to lively direct questioning on television on domestic policy issues such as education, public housing, and transportation. However, these discussions and debates were not continued during 1984.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Political activity outside the Democratic Party of Gabon is illegal. The Government does not interfere in other non-political organizations which individuals may wish to form. In some sectors, for example, sports clubs and social service organizations, there are national programs under government auspices, which dominate the scheduling of competitions and other activities, but diverse private groups and events sponsored by private companies also exist.

All labor union activity is under the government-sponsored Gabonese Labor Confederation. This organization is closely tied to the governing political structure and serves to represent the interests of workers in a national collective bargaining process, by sector, which is convened by government decree. This bargaining process determines salary levels throughout Gabon, which then must be approved by the Government. Petroleum sector employees have organized wildcat strikes successfully in the past to obtain wage increases and other objectives. Government employees are not permitted to belong to unions. The Gabonese Labor Confederation is a member of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity.

The collective convention on labor, negotiated by the labor confederation and national employers over the course of several years, entered into force in 1983. It prescribes workers benefits and working conditions by sector. Based on this code, workers individually or collectively may in theory and do in practice take complaints of labor code violations to arbitration, and, if unsuccessful, may and have appealed to the national courts. Labor courts, which had fallen into disuse, are presently being resuscitated by the Government to improve the labor conciliation process.

An estimated 65,000 foreign workers, many of them contract employees, are subject to minimum protection by the Government and may be fired or expelled to make place for unemployed nationals.

In 1984 the International Labor Organization's (ILO) Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations cited Gabon for violation of ILO Convention No. 87, involving workers' right to organize. The basis for this citation is Gabonese legislation making membership in the sole trade union confederation mandatory.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Gabonese Constitution guarantees the free practice of religion, and religious freedom and tolerance. Proselytizing has sometimes been discouraged. Christian, Muslim and animist religions, nonetheless, all flourish in Gabon, and public worship is unrestricted. A number of different religious groups operate schools. There is no political or economic discrimination because of religious preference.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Movement within the country, foreign travel, and return to Gabon are normally not restricted by the Government. Government employees, however, must obtain permission to travel abroad and private citizens must obtain exit permits. Since mid-1983, the Government has slightly tightened restrictions on the entry and resettlement of refugees, but many individuals who have a "well-founded fear of persecution" in their country of origin have been given permission to stay in Gabon; they come from a variety of countries, including those with which Gabon has friendly bilateral relations. There have been no reported cases of involuntary repatriation, and those refugees who wish to repatriate voluntarily are allowed to do so.

GABON

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Gabon is governed by a centralized, single-party regime in which President Omar Bongo exercises most but not all effective power. Major political and economic decisions are made by the President, usually in consultation with cabinet members. This group of 54 includes representatives of all the country's major ethnic, geographic, and political groupings. Gabon's varied interest groups are thus given access to political patronage. The Fang, an ethnic group comprising 40 percent of the population, feel themselves to be underrepresented. Fear of Fang dominance by the remaining 60 percent has contributed to the President's political control. The need to maintain the balance of interests represents, therefore, the major check on presidential power. The very size and complexity of the government structure is another.

Opposition political parties are not permitted. Membership in the single political party is open to all Gabonese but is not required. Elections below the presidential level are sometimes contested, but all candidates must be approved by the Democratic Party of Gabon.

Women enjoy full legal rights in Gabon, although their influence and overall participation in government is limited by cultural factors. The Gabonese legal system contains many statutes providing specific rights and protection to women, but most are probably unaware of these provisions.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

President Bongo has invited representatives of Amnesty International and other human rights organizations to visit Gabon. An Amnesty International representative from Senegal was present in 1982 for the major human rights-related event in recent years, the public trial of the Morena dissidents. The United Nations High Commission for Refugees has had a refugee office in Gabon, but its functions have been assumed by the United Nations Development Program, since the number of refugees from Equatorial Guinea has dropped substantially.

In its 1984 Report, Amnesty International expressed concern about the continued imprisonment of 18 prisoners of conscience, 17 of whom were sentenced to long prison terms in the dissidents' trials. Amnesty argued that the court proceedings did not conform to recognized international standards. A special report on the trials issued in 1984 renewed and detailed Amnesty criticism. This report was rebutted in Gabon's press. Freedom House rates Gabon "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Gabon is a developing country which as a result of significant petroleum and mineral resources and a population of only one million has one of the highest per capita incomes in Africa -- about $4000 in 1982. Gabon has enjoyed substantial economic growth over the past 10 years, helped in part by the Government's policy of supporting private enterprise and encouraging foreign investment. However, economic growth has stagnated over the last three years due to the depressed state of world markets for Gabon's principal exports. In spite of its good economic record, Gabon faces the problem common in developing countries of trying to integrate the modern sector of the economy with the traditional sector based on semi-subsistence agriculture. Income distribution is skewed in favor of the roughly 50 percent of the population who live in the modern urban sector. The Government is attempting to ensure further economic growth and a more equitable distribution of national income through a program of investment in education, social services, infrastructure, and agriculture. Access to the Government's social programs is open to all Gabonese citizens on a non-discriminatory basis. The right of both men and women to hold private property is spelled out in the Constitution and is in practice fully protected. Pay scales are relatively high by African standards with the minimum wage at about $125 per month. There is little unemployment among Gabonese wishing to enter the wage economy. Some unemployment exists among recent baccalaureate and university graduates.

According to the World Bank, life expectancy at birth rose from 40.2 in 1970 to 50 years in 1984. Estimates of infant mortality have varied widely. The World Bank statistics for 1984 of 162 per 1000 indicate a slight decrease from 1983. The large majority of the population has access to maternity clinics and basic health facilities. A World Bank estimate of the ratio of available calorie supply to nutritional requirements was 103.76 percent in 1977. There has been no evidence of significant malnutrition due to inadequate food supplies, but lack of knowledge of good nutritional practices for children in the traditional sector remains a problem. The World Bank in 1980 gave the primary school enrollment ratio as 100.66 percent. The Government has made school attendance compulsory and nearly all primary school-aged children are believed to be attending school.

In recent years, women have begun to play an increasing role in the economic, political, and cultural life of the country, particularly in the urban areas. The Government and party have become more sensitized to women's issues, and newly-created government and party institutions are actively promoting women's rights. The Ministry of Women's Affairs in 1984 commanded additional resources, including the creation of a national commission for the promotion of women. The Ministry's action program is still largely at the planning stage, although an effort is under way to determine women's needs and aspirations in the traditional agricultural sector. The party's women's union is active in organizing women's cultural presentations throughout the country. Although no women are found among the top 40 full government ministers, four women occupy cabinet level positions as secretaries of state, and nine others occupy junior minister positions. Women are particularly active in the judiciary.

THE GAMBIA

A former British colony on the West African Coast, The Gambia is a parliamentary democracy with an elected President. The country is extremely small (slightly over 4,000 square miles) and is virtually surrounded by neighboring Senegal. Its population of 725,000 consists largely of subsistence farmers growing rice and the country's primary export crop--groundnuts (peanuts). The Gambia has functioning democratic institutions and, with the exception of disorders in 1980 and a bloody attempted coup in 1981, has had a history of political stability under the leadership of its first President, Sir Dawda Jawara. The ruling People's Progressive Party dominates the House of Representatives; the leading opposition party and independents also won seats in the May 1982 legislative elections.

A state of emergency imposed after the July 1981 coup attempt continues in effect, giving the Government wide powers of detention. There were 1,091 persons originally detained in 1981 after the bloody disorders, led by leftist elements and supported by a large part of the police field force, which resulted in the deaths of over 800 people. Of those detained, 903 were released and 188 were brought to trial, of whom 55 were acquitted. Three died while under detention during their trial, 25 were sentenced to prison, and 63 were sentenced to death for treason. Of the latter, one was acquitted on appeal and another had his sentence reduced. To date, as the death sentences have been confirmed by appeal court, the President has been commuting them to either life or 20 years' imprisonment. There are no outstanding cases left arising from the events of July 1981.

The process of confederation with Senegal, formalized by the treaty of December 1981, continued during 1984, albeit at a slower pace. Important steps were taken during the year in implementation of the protocols on defense and security. The Gambia gendarmerie has been organized on the Senegalese model and is currently being trained and commanded by a Senegalese officer (a Gambian successor is currently undergoing training in a third country). The Gambian army is being trained by both Senegalese and British officers, with the former emphasizing the confederal component and the latter concentrating on the national contingent.

Along with many of its neighbors, The Gambia was sorely affected by the world recession and a decrease in the demand and the market price for groundnuts. Drought affected both groundnut and rice production. The Government signed a stand-by agreement with the IMF to provide badly needed balance-of-payments and budgetary support, but has had to accept stringent spending and import limitations.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There have been no instances of political killing in The Gambia in 1984. To date, 61 persons have been sentenced to death--after lengthy public trials observing due process of law--for crimes committed in connection with the 1981 coup attempt. The cases have now gone through appeal and, in each case brought to the President, executive clemency has been granted. No executions have taken place.

b. Disappearance

There is no known record or allegation of abduction or secret detention by any element of the Government or by any group in the country.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The constitutional prohibition against torture is observed in practice. No allegations of torture were noted in 1984. The Constitution also contains prohibitions against cruel, inhuman, and degrading punishment. Persons familiar with the operation of the legal system, and whose opinions are respected, believe that courts are alert to any allegation of mistreatment in prisons. These sources also acknowledge that there may be lapses in supervision resulting in individual instances of mistreatment of prisoners. There are segregated prison facilities for men and women of both maximum and minimum security types. The Government has allowed prison visits by representatives of the local Red Cross and by close family members. Sentences, including fines and imprisonment, are related to the severity of the crime committed and are based upon schedules set forth in statutes or regulations.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

There are well developed constitutional and legal procedures governing the arrest, detention, and bringing to trial of persons accused of crimes. These are based on British legal practice. However, under the Emergency Act still in force, the Government may order the detention of any person who is considered to have been involved in acts prejudicial to the public safety or public order, in the preparation or instigation of such acts, or in impeding the maintenance of supplies and services essential to the life of the community. Such persons may be held up to 14 days without a detention order. Detainees are free to exercise their right to legal counsel. The Emergency Act, which has been extended by the legislature several times, continues in force.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Three kinds of law operate in The Gambia: general, Shari'a, and customary law. Shari'a law, governing certain aspects of social interaction of rural Muslims, is observed, even in the capital of Banjul, in marriage and divorce proceedings. Customary law covers marriage, inheritance, divorce, land tenure and utilization, local government, and all other civil and social relations originating in the traditional religious and ethnic situation of the country. General law, based on English statutes and modified to suit the Gambian context, governs criminal cases and trials and most organized business practices. If there were a conflict between general and Shari'a law, general law would prevail. Trial procedures in general law are carefully regulated to insure protection of the rights of the accused. Under the law, a detained person must come to trial within one week. This waiting period, however, can be extended twice, making the total time of detention before trial allowed under the law 21 days. If an accused person is released on bail, the individual need not come to trial until the investigation is completed, and there apparently is no time limit for investigations. Appeals normally proceed from the Supreme (trial) Court to the Court of Appeal, the country's highest tribunal. Jury trials are limited to certain specified cases such as murder.

Trials for those persons detained by Presidential order under the Emergency Act were delayed because of the extraordinary measures the Government undertook to cope with the large number of detainees. The court system in this tiny nation was overwhelmed. The Government therefore established a special division of the Supreme (trial) Court, which included judges and prosecuting and defense attorneys from neighboring English-speaking countries, all of which have the same basic legal system as The Gambia. This unusual step was taken because of a shortage of trained legal personnel in The Gambia, to avoid overwhelming the regular judicial process, and to demonstrate publicly the Government's concern for impartiality. The Government has scrupulously observed the statute of limitation and has reportedly released numerous detainees

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence.

The Constitution provides guarantees against arbitrary search of person and property. It excepts the voluntary submission to a search by the individual, or a search that is reasonably required in the interests of national defense or other public interest. Under the criminal code, search warrants are issued by magistrates upon application by the police, based on probable cause. Under the Emergency Act, searches of premises or vehicles for suspected firearms or other enumerated articles are authorized by the Inspector General of Police or the Commander of Military Forces. There are a number of police and military checkpoints in and around Banjul. Drivers are stopped and vehicles searched from time to time.

The rights of family are of extreme importance in this conservative Muslim society. Marriage, the raising of children, and religious instruction are regulated by a combination of individual preference and ethnic and religious tradition. The Government does not intrude in family matters except to protect public safety and morality. There is no effort to censor or control personal correspondence or communications.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution provides guarantees of press freedom. In practical terms, The Gambia, with its small, mainly rural, largely illiterate, and multilingual population, does not support an active press. There are no dailies. There is a government weekly paper and several intermittently published mimeographed news sheets. Le Soleil, a Dakar-based paper, publishes an English-language weekly, using Gambian staff and concentrating on Gambian news. There is a government radio station, as well as a private commercial station which broadcasts largely musical programs. Magazines and some newspapers from outside the country are available at a few outlets in the capital. There is no television in The Gambia, although Senegalese stations can be received.

The Government dominates the media through Radio Gambia, but there have been no reported instances of government interference with the commercial radio station. The Government does not attempt to censor published materials originating either within or outside the country. The Emergency Act, with its broad powers of detention, has had an inhibiting effect on criticism of the Government by independent news sheets; commentators are said to have been noticeably more outspoken in the past.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

There are no restrictions on freedom of association and assembly in the Constitution. Under the Emergency Act, however, public meetings are held only with prior notification to and permission from the police. According to the best information available, no permits for meetings have been denied, but the authorities require meetings to be public. Trade unions remain a minor element in Gambian economic and political life. Less than 20 percent of the work force is engaged in the industry, commerce, and service sectors where unions normally are active. Trade unions are small and fragmented. The Government has agreed in principle that the Gambian Workers Union may resume its functions provided it is re-registered, but the Union has not been willing to meet conditions on filing financial reports and rectifying alleged fiscal irregularities. Other unions continue to function under basic labor and trade union legislation. Union members have freedom of movement to attend meetings outside the country.

c. Freedom of Religion

The constitutional guarantees of freedom of conscience, thought, and religion are observed in practice. The state is secular. Muslims constitute over 90 percent of the population; the schools provide instruction in the Koran for Muslim students. Christians, both Catholic and Protestant, freely and actively practice their religion. There is a small Bahai community in Banjul. Missionaries are permitted to carry on their work in the country. No evidence of discrimination on the grounds of religion has been observed in employment or education or in other areas of Gambian life.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Constitution has provisions guaranteeing freedom of movement subject to conditions protecting public safety, health, and morals. There is no restriction on freedom of emigration or freedom of return. Internally, police and military checkpoints exist in and around Banjul; under the Emergency Act, travelers and their vehicles may be searched. There is no evidence that police harass travelers.

Because of historic and ethnic ties with the people of Senegal, Guinea-Bissau, Guinea, and Mali, people tend to move unregulated across borders, which are poorly marked and difficult to police. Under the Confederation Treaty of 1981, neither Gambians nor Senegalese require passports or visas to travel to the other's country. The border is essentially open, and movement across the border is constant. There is a high tolerance for foreigners and no effort is made by the Government to discriminate against them. There are no refugees in The Gambia. Early in 1983, some 600 Gambians were among the vast number of illegal aliens expelled by Nigeria. Their return has caused no noticeable impact. With the change of regime in Guinea, there is evidence that many Guineans formerly resident in The Gambia are returning to Guinea.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The Government is elected by citizens 18 years of age and older; the chief executive official (the President) and the members of the legislature (House of Representatives) are popularly elected, as are the district councils and the chiefs who exercise traditional authority in the villages and compounds.

A functioning multiparty system exists in The Gambia. The principal opposition party, the National Convention Party, contests national and district elections. Other opposition parties contest the Presidency and other offices on a selected basis.

Independents have run for and won legislative seats. In the 1982 election, the Government party, the People's Progressive Party, won 35 seats in the House of Representatives, the National Convention Party 6, and independents 2. The opposition is not able to defeat or modify significant legislation because of its small size, but debate is open and accepted parliamentary procedures are observed.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

After the coup attempt in 1981, the Government adopted a policy of permitting visits of international human rights organizations to observe the conditions of the detainees and the trial process. Amnesty International sent an observer in January 1982 to attend two trials; an Amnesty mission in August 1982 then visited The Gambia and held discussions with high government officials, including President Jawara. The only humanitarian organization in The Gambia is the local Red Cross. There have been no requests for investigation of alleged human rights abuses in The Gambia by an international or non-governmental organization during 1984. The 1984 Amnesty International Report focused on the status of the prisoners charged with the failed coup attempt of July 1981. Freedom House terms The Gambia "partly free." Internationally, the Government has been a proponent of human rights in Africa and in January 1983 became the 17th OAU member to ratify the African Charter of Human Rights.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The Gambia is a poor, almost overwhelmingly agricultural, nation with a population of 725,000 people (1984). The population growth rate is 3.5 percent a year. Per capita GNP (1984) is $359.60. The adult literacy rate is 20.1 percent (1984). Approximately 45 percent (1981) of eligible children attend primary school. The new Gambia College provides post-secondary training leading to certificates in teaching, agriculture, and nursing, but there is no university-level institution in The Gambia.

THE GAMBIA

Life expectancy at birth is 42 years; the infant mortality rate in 1983 was 195.6 per 1,000. Only 12 percent (1970) of the population is believed to have access to safe water (the urban rate is 97 percent). The ratio of calorie supply available for consumption relative to nutritional requirements is 93 percent (1977).

Almost 83 percent of the people live in rural areas. The principal ethnic groups are Mandinka, Woloff, Fula, Jola, and Serahuli. Most people are Muslim. Rural life is village and family oriented. While individual initiative and choices are valued, rights and privileges are generally perceived to reside in the group rather than in the individual. Traditional values remain strong but are changing. Education of women is increasingly accepted, and women participate in the professions and in political life. Marriages are still often arranged, but there is increasing freedom of personal choice. Family planning, focused on the health and welfare of mother and child, remains controversial but is gaining acceptance. There is a Women's Bureau in the Office of the President which actively promotes debate on women's issues.

The strength of community practices and traditions has strongly influenced the high degree of tolerance in the diverse Gambian society. There is a deep respect for the tradition of living at peace with one's neighbors. The level of intercommunal violence is extremely low.

The Gambia depends on one major crop, groundnuts, for foreign exchange; this is subject to the vagaries of weather and world market conditions. The population consists mostly of subsistence farmers who are not able to satisfy The Gambia's food requirements. As a result, the Government has relied on external food assistance for the last several years, and adopted a five-year development plan which emphasizes crop diversification and greater agricultural productivity.

Practically all of the funding for the development plan must come from external sources--grants and loans. The Government's ability to absorb and administer the assistance has been hampered by a lack of facilities and trained personnel.

GHANA

Ghana is governed by the Provisional National Defense Council under the chairmanship of Flight Lieutenant Jerry J. Rawlings, who seized power on December 31, 1981, citing a variety of abuses of authority by the previous Government, elected in 1979. Council law 42 vests all executive, legislative, judicial, and administrative power in its chairman. In practice, government policy develops from a number of close advisors, both inside and outside government. The Council was recently restored to its original strength of seven members in an effort to achieve participation by individuals representing a broader spectrum of Ghanaian political beliefs. A cabinet composed of the secretaries (ministers) implements the day-to-day activity of government. A strengthened security service actively guards against both dissident incursions from abroad and internal challenges to the existence of the Government. A network of "Committees for the Defense of the Revolution" is designed as a channel to transmit government policies to the citizens and citizen concerns to the Government. The major broadcast and print media are government-owned and support government policies.

In 1983, the Government adopted an exceptionally austere economic reform program in an effort to redress a quarter century of economic mismanagement and political instability which caused Ghana to decline from one of Africa's most promising states to a level of economic collapse and poverty. Remedial measures have included an over 1000 percent devaluation, severe structural readjustments, and an emphasis upon the rural rather than urban population. In concert with the International Monetary Fund, the three-year program has begun to have a positive impact and has attracted support from foreign donors (including the United States) and international financial institutions. The economic growth rate, which was negative in 1982, was reversed in 1983 and is expected to reach 5 percent in 1984, with pre-1983 triple digit inflation reduced to 35 percent.

On the whole, positive trends in human rights identified in the second half of 1983 continued during 1984. The universities were reopened. The curfew imposed since the assumption of power by the Rawlings regime in 1981 was lifted, and the country's borders, closed since September 1982, were reopened. A number of detainees, including all journalists, were released. Physical attacks upon various institutions and groups ceased. A freely elected trade union leadership has supplanted a government-appointed management group. Discipline is gradually being restored in the uniformed services and the police, and among militant political cadres.

However, systematic violations of internationally defined human rights continue to exist. Although the Government has expressed its intent to restore democratic practices, there is as yet no system of elections or any other method to provide for expression of the popular will or for a peaceful change of government. Remaining detainees have been incarcerated for over two years without having been formally charged. While a public tribunal system (parallel to the established court system) has been revamped to provide for appeal procedures, its practices continue to limit its effectiveness and fairness as an alternative system of justice.

GHANA

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

The level of politically motivated violence and killing has abated considerably since 1982/83. However, the death of one person after alleged participation in a coup attempt in March 1984 resulted in claims that he was summarily executed, although the Government claimed that the individual was killed while trying to escape from custody. Those who were close to the victim and who contradicted the Government's explanation did not press formal charges. Senior government legal officials have indicated that an inquiry into the circumstances of death would have been ordered had there been a complaint. One allegation of Government execution of a returned exile appeared in the foreign press; the Government found the person alive and presented him to the public at an Accra press conference.

b. Disappearance

During 1984 there were no reported disappearances traceable to government action.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There were no reports of torture during 1984, but several detainees died shortly after release, leading to surmises that prolonged incarceration may have been responsible in one way or another for their untimely deaths. Also Amnesty International's Report for 1984 states that ill-treatment such as beatings of certain prisoners occurred in 1983. There are recurrent reports that very primitive prison conditions have been somewhat improved. Some prisoners have been released to reduce overcrowding and systems of weekend furloughs begun for certain categories of prisoners pending appeals. Service organizations and family members are permitted to provide for prisoners, and there are regular church services. The Government has moved on several occasions to chastise local officials for brutal acts in handling the public but occasional minor offenses persist, particularly in crowd control situations and at checkpoints.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Reports of persons arrested or held in detention without charge or trial decreased during 1984. Nevertheless, beginning in the middle of December 1984 a number of military personnel were reportedly detained for questioning in connection with suspected dissident activity. Moreover, sources indicate that nearly 50 civilian and military detainees have remained incarcerated for periods ranging from 6 to 33 months without being formally charged. In addition, senior government legal officers acknowledge that some persons are held in jail on remand for prolonged periods prior to trial. It is difficult to compile information on the number of detainees, as the Government normally does not announce detentions or releases. However, in August 1984 a Government representative stated that: "Of the persons involved in the previous Government, held in detention for investigations into their conduct whilst in office, only seven are still held." Of the detainees acknowledged to be held by the Government, one has been in traction for some months and another has been hospitalized for a nervous disorder.

Writs of habeas corpus were filed at the high court in Accra in 1984 for the release of a total of 36 civilian detainees. The first writ covered two journalists and was followed by their release. The second application for habeas corpus sought the release of 34 detainees, including a number of ex-officials from the previous Government. In this case the Government successfully maneuvered to have the application dismissed through a new law preventing any court from inquiring into the grounds for the detention of any Ghanaian detained under Council law 2.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Traditional legal safeguards remain available in the established court system, which includes high courts, appeal courts and a Supreme Court headed by a Chief Justice. However, the Rawlings Government also established a number of other judicial-type bodies which parallel the older court system. These organs include the public tribunals, the Citizens' Vetting Committee (recently renamed the Office of Revenue Commissioners), the National Investigations Committee, the Special Military Tribunal, and the Public Tribunals Board. Council law 78, effective December 21, 1983, established a new public tribunals board to supervise the public tribunals set up originally in 1982. National, regional, district, and community public tribunals are envisaged; the national regional tribunals already have been established in most cases. Critics of the public tribunals, however, decry the almost complete absence of trained and experienced legal practitioners on the tribunals, and insist that accepted rules of evidence and procedure are not always followed. Because of the lack of legal safeguards, the Ghana Bar Association has boycotted the public tribunals since their inception. Government officials acknowledge imperfections but defend the new tribunals as a means of providing justice more quickly, to more people, with less corruption. They defend the ability of laymen to make independent judgments, and have instituted a training program for lay officials.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

There has been a lessening during 1984 of reports of personal harassment. Government action reduced the number of checkpoints, many unofficial and apparently set up to shake down the public. However, in an effort to control smuggling, government authorities at ports of entry and exit conducted intrusive and unhygienic body searches of travelers. In response to widespread criticism, the Government reduced the number of such searches and stated its intent to improve the conditions under which they are conducted.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Government owns the radio and television stations as well as the two principal daily newspapers. The previously lively weekly press has almost disappeared but several small papers have begun to reappear on an irregular basis. All detained journalists were freed in 1984 but two died shortly after release. The press abides by guided tenets of promoting public programs and avoiding criticism of the revolution or of Chairman Rawlings and now focuses on uncovering instances of waste, fraud, and mismanagement. Allegations of corruption generally receive wide coverage and dismissals of officials are reported.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Restrictions on peaceful assembly and association continue. Police permits are required for public meetings and are usually granted, except where the purpose of the meeting is suspected to be anti-government in nature. As a result of a free election for the leadership of the Trades Union Congress in December 1983, the International Labor Organization (ILO) in 1984 removed Ghana from its list of countries with which the ILO has complaints. The Trades Union Congress is a member of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity which has its headquarters in Accra. The universities opened to complete the term which was in progress when they were closed in 1983.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion exists with no state or otherwise favored religion. There is no restriction on the exercise of religion or in contacts with others of the same faith. Most Ghanaians, including senior government officials, are practicing members of a faith. Foreign missionary groups operate freely throughout the country. Leaders of organized religion have tempered their earlier criticism of the Government, while remaining alert to shortcomings and abuses. Church leaders generally state that the tone and actions of the Government toward the churches have improved markedly in 1984 compared to the clashes in early 1983. Government-owned newspapers, on the other hand, remain critical of what they occasionally consider to be political misuse of the pulpit.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

People are free to move from one part of the country to another without any special permission or pass requirement. Since 1983, diplomats have been required to give 48 hours notice before traveling outside the greater Accra region. While the number is being reduced, there are still a number of roadblocks, both official and unofficial, sufficient to inhibit travel, especially at night. In addition to questions related to security concerns, travelers may be asked for receipts for particular items. Failure to have proper documentation can lead to forfeiture of the goods and possible trial for smuggling.

As members of the Economic Community of West African States, Ghanaians and citizens of other member states are free to travel for up to 90 days in West Africa. Ghanaians are generally free to exercise this right, as nationals of other member states are free to travel to Ghana. The major restraint on travel by Ghanaians is the lack of foreign exchange. Previously-closed land borders with Togo and the Ivory Coast were opened in June 1984, and a midnight to 4:30 a.m. curfew, which had been in effect since the revolution of December 31, 1981, was also lifted.

GHANA

Ghanaians are free to emigrate or to be repatriated from other countries unless they are considered a security threat and then special permission must be obtained. Passports are prized and there are frequent long delays in issuance. Applicants for refugee status within Ghana, upon certification by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), are granted refugee status and are not subject to return to their countries.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The Provisional National Defense Council, chaired by Flight Lieutenant Rawlings, exercises total executive and legislative power in Ghana. There are no elections and no current procedure by which citizens can freely and peacefully choose to change their laws, officials, or form of government. However, Rawlings' recent appointments to the Council reflect a broad spectrum of views. A panel to design new democratic structures to replace Ghana's current provisional system is currently at work.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government permitted several organizations to send representatives to Ghana to inquire into the human rights situation during the past year. The President of the International Press Institute inquired into the fate of several imprisoned journalists (the last one was freed in July). A representative of the International Committee of the Red Cross continued regular visits. The Ghana section of Amnesty International held a conference on humanitarian law. The International Commission of Jurists sent a representative to look into the human rights situation and prepare a report. The International Labor Organization received permission to send a mission to Ghana. However, the Government is sensitive to any implication that its decisions on human rights questions can be affected by external or internal pressures. Detainee releases, for example, are not announced publicly.

Within the country there are a number of religious and professional bodies concerned about human rights and relevant government policies. These institutions during the early days of the present Government called attention to human rights violations. However, after a number of attacks on their members and subsequent detentions (all members of professional bodies detained since the December 1981 revolution have since been released), they have focused their activities on prison reform and emergency feeding programs. Official human rights matters are handled by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, although inquiries from groups such as Amnesty International may be answered by any one of a number of agencies and at various levels, including cabinet secretaries. Amnesty International has shown concern for the lack of adequate legal safeguards in the tribunal system and adopted one person found guilty by a tribunal as a prisoner of conscience. In its 1984 report, Amnesty expressed concern about the continued detention without trial of real or suspected opponents of the Government. Freedom House terms Ghana "not free." Ghana participates in the work of the U.N. Human Rights Commission in Geneva. Ghana was a member of the U.N. Human Rights Commission in Geneva from 1970-1975 and 1980-1983.

GHANA

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Ghana is a developing country of 12.2 million citizens according to the 1984 census. The population growth rate is 3.2 percent (1984). Life expectancy at birth is 55.6 years, and the infant mortality rate in 1984 was estimated at 76.3 per 1,000 live births. The per capita gross national product was estimated at $356 in 1982. Ghana has a mixed economy, with the Government owning a number of enterprises in the agricultural, mining, and manufacturing sectors while most productive agricultural enterprises, including the key cocoa sector, are owned by small farmers. The Government maintains a monopoly over the purchase and export of cocoa, coffee, shea nuts, and cotton. There is also a substantial private trading sector, although the Government favors the state-owned companies in national procurement and distribution.

Ghana adopted an exceptionally austere economic reform program in 1983 which has met all targets and is supported by the IMF, IBRD, and primary Western donors, including the U.S. The recovery program is designed to reverse the country's economic decline over the past two decades. Among its features have been a devaluation of Ghana's currency by over 1,400 percent; establishment of producer and export incentives, e.g., increased prices paid to cocoa and coffee farmers; the progressive elimination of subsidies on utilities and petroleum products; budgetary stringency; and an emphasis upon improving the standard of living in rural areas. The recovery program is showing signs of success: real GNP grew at an estimated 0.7 percent rate in 1983 and 5.5 percent in 1984, and triple digit inflation is targeted to fall to 35 percent by the end of 1985. Moreover, the Government worked efficiently with the international community in 1983-84 to overcome a major drought and food crisis.

In 1970, the adult literacy rate was estimated to be 30.2 percent, with the male level at 43.1 percent and the female at 18.4 percent. That difference could be attributed partly to limited educational facilities and a traditional preference for educating male over female children. Current literacy rates are not available, but by 1979 primary school enrollment ratios indicated improvement in access to education with 69 percent of school-age children enrolled, 77 percent for boys and 60 percent for girls. In 1975, 35 percent of the population had access to safe drinking water (86 percent of the urban population). A renewed emphasis is now being placed on creating or improving wells in rural areas, particularly in the northern regions.

Ethnic discrimination is not a major problem in Ghana. Government officials cover the ethnic spectrum. Some ethnic concentration occurs in selected professions and at senior military and security levels. Women's rights in the economy, business, and the civil service, as well as in the home, have long been well established and respected. There are two women among the seven members of the ruling Provisional National Defense Council, a woman cabinet member, and at least five woman in sub-cabinet positions. Although women in urban centers and those who have entered modern society encounter little bias in most endeavors, some role pressures exist. Women in the rural agricultural sector remain subject to the constraints associated with traditional male-dominant mores, in spite of efforts by the Government and more enlightened elements in the society to curtail these practices.

GUINEA

The human rights situation has improved in the Republic of Guinea since a change in government on April 3, 1984, and after the death in March of long-time President Ahmed Sekou Toure, who had controlled the previous one-party "socialist" state since 1958. The country is now ruled by a 20-man Military Committee for National Redressment (CMRN). Upon seizing power April 3, 1984, the CMRN abolished Toure's Democratic Party of Guinea and the Constitution, and named a President (Lansana Conte), a Prime Minister, and a cabinet of 33 military and 8 civilians. (In a reorganization December 18, 1984, the Office of the Prime Minister was abolished and the Cabinet and CMRN reduced in numbers.) Members of the various armed forces were named to principal offices at the regional and sub-regional levels. Citizens have subsequently been invited to organize representative councils at the local level. Although the CMRN has indicated that a new constitution will be provided, there are no immediate plans to allow the formation of political parties or return to civilian rule.

The previous regime had imprisoned without trial and executed many Guineans over a period of years, including up to the time of the coup. Torture of prisoners was commonplace and thousands simply disappeared. Toward the end, Toure had begun to relax controls on several aspects of Guinea's political and social life beginning in the late 1970's. A general amnesty of all Guinean exiles had been declared in July 1977, and thousands of emigrants returned to Guinea. However, immediately after the coup, the military government released 250 political prisoners, mainly from Camp Boiro, the principal political detention center, and permitted reporters to describe the heinous conditions and practices, including standard tiny concrete cells and the "black diet" (total deprivation of food and water). The new military Government invited Amnesty International to interview former political detainees in the early fall (report not yet available), and signed an "instrument of adherence by the Republic of Guinea to the Geneva Conventions of August 12, 1949, (plus additional protocols) on Civil and Political Rights. It also announced its intent to adhere to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Guinea is a resource-rich but economically underdeveloped country. Its agricultural sector, which produces mostly at subsistence levels, provides livelihood for over 80 percent of the population and contributes 40 percent of the gross domestic product. The modern sector consists of a few mining enclaves, which generate nearly all of Guinea's foreign exchange, and a variety of uneconomic state-owned industrial, agro-industrial, and commercial enterprises. The previous regime had undertaken cautious steps toward reform of an economy that consisted of these uneconomic state-owned institutions and declining agricultural production resulting from state-owned collective farms, but inflation and balance of payments difficulties persisted.

The new Government has abolished the agricultural collective farms and is investigating the possibility of returning some of the state-owned enterprises to the private sector. It has invited the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank and other international and bilateral donors to provide technical and material assistance for restructuring the economy, strengthening the currency, rescheduling foreign debt, developing an investment code, and reversing the unfavorable balance of payments.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Since the bloodless coup in April 1984, there were no reported instances of politically motivated killings in Guinea. However, prior to the coup, the Toure regime continued up to the end the practice of jailing political prisoners without trial, and political killings may have taken place in the first months of 1984. A New York Times correspondent visited Camp Boiro after the coup and described a variety of harsh prison conditions and practices, including use of the "black diet" to kill prisoners. The Times article estimated that several thousand had died at Camp Boiro during Toure's regime.

b. Disappearance

Amnesty International in its 1984 report (covering 1983) stressed the Toure Government's continued failure to account for a large number of political detainees, estimated at 2,900, who had simply "disappeared" from custody in previous years. These detainees included some of the leading professionals, senior government and military officials, lawyers, teachers, and medical personnel. With the advent of the new Government in April, there were no reported instances of disappearance in Guinea during the remainder of 1984. At the invitation of the postcoup Government, Amnesty International visited Guinea during October 1984 to search for more information on the earlier disappearances.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Upon coming to power in April 1984, the CMRN condemned the previous regime for cruel and inhuman treatment of prisoners, allowed the international press to visit Camp Boiro and interview former prisoners, and pledged henceforth to abolish such practices and adhere to the international charter of human rights. Subsequent reports in the national and international press documented in detail the cruel and inhuman treatment accorded prisoners and detainees, when the new government opened Camp Boiro to public inspection. Amnesty International also noted that torture and other forms of ill-treatment took place on a regular basis, and many died as a result of she "black diet" or of malnutrition and disease.

The only form of abuse reported since the coup is occasional beating of suspects in police stations after arrest. In one such case, when the suspect died, the policemen involved were arrested, tried, and sentenced to prison.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Amnesty International estimated in its 1984 report that, under the Toure Government, the number of political detainees at any one time at Camp Boiro, the main detention center, averaged about 200 persons. Most stayed for several months and then were released or moved to another prison. Many people had been detained merely for expressing some form of dissent from party policy.

An ordinance signed August 15, 1984, contained provisions for reorganizing the Guinean judicial system following recommendations of a national conference on justice. Precise details concerning arbitrary arrest and detention are not yet known. In the several cases of robbery, murder, and drug smuggling that have been publicized, the time elapsing between arrests, holding of trials, and passing of judgments has appeared reasonable.

The only known cases of detention without a judicial determination of the legality of detention are those of former government leaders, some family members, and members of the military who reportedly attempted a countercoup shortly after the April 3 coup. The precise number is unknown. President Lansana Conte has announced publicly that these prisoners will be put on trial but has not given a timetable. He has stated the CMRN is proceeding slowly in its investigations "to avoid inflicting any unmerited punishments on anyone."

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Amnesty International pointed out that those detained by the previous regime for political reasons were afforded no protection by the judicial structure. None detained in 1983 was believed to have been charged or tried by the court. The New York Times article reported that 153 prisoners were sentenced to Camp Boiro in 1983 and 95 more in the first three months of 1984.

The newly reorganized judicial system is independent with courts of first instance at the subprefecture and prefecture levels, courts of appeal at the provincial level and a supreme court at the national level. There also are to be juvenile courts, a labor court, and a military tribunal. Judges are to be appointed on the basis of their qualifications instead of political credentials as was the previous practice. Private legal practice has been restored and legal assistance is to be provided the poor to ensure that everyone will have the benefit of fair trials. The Government is also in the process of revising various legal codes. Until the reorganization is completed, and the new legal system is in full operation, it is not possible to judge its effectiveness.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The labor, women's, and youth organizations of the previous party-state, in which all government employees felt obliged to participate, were abolished by the CMRN. These organizations, together with the entire education system, had been concerned with organizing classes in ideology and providing civic education. The education system is now being reorganized to eliminate ideology. Postgraduate seminars in party ideology previously required of all university graduates and a 6-9 week militia "boot camp" have been replaced by one-year compulsory military training for all graduates, men and women alike.

Judicial codes and practices are in the process of being revised, and provisions relating to entry and search of homes have not yet been issued. Censorship of international mail, which existed under the previous government, appears to have ceased.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Government owns and operates all Guinean media. A statute permitting nongovernment publications is pending. Until April 1984, criticism of the Government was rarely allowed and journalists generally confined their reporting to accounts of government activities and development issues. Foreign books, newspapers and journals were rarely available in Guinea and censorship or printed material existed.

Since April 1984, the new Government has been vigorously engaged in promoting freedom of speech and press. However, given the nature of the Government and the lack of tradition in Guinea for freely ventilating opposition viewpoints, inhibitions still appear to exist in this area. In regard to criticism of the Government, CMRN members have asked for "constructive" criticism by Guinean citizens. Films, as well as publications distributed by diplomatic missions in Guinea, continue to be censored.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Public meetings previously were organized under the auspices of the party-state. Although the CMRN has not specifically stated so, individuals apparently now have the right to meet to promote nonviolent causes. The most notable occasion since April 1984 was a recent ethnic celebration that would not have been permitted before the coup.

Under the previous government, labor unions were controlled by the party-state, union leaders were elected from a single slate drawn up by the party, and union membership of employees in government, public enterprises, and private joint ventures was mandatory. The new Government abolished the party but kept the unions. On October 11, 1984, the Ministry of Labor announced the restructuring of Guinea's labor movement, removal of present labor leaders, and forthcoming elections for new leaders. The previous regime's 35 regional labor organizations, which were linked to the party-state's regional administrative apparatus, will be replaced by a number of local unions organized along industrial lines. There will be 14 industrial trade federations and one national confederation, the national confederation of Guinean workers. Union membership will be voluntary and democratic elections for leaders were being held in January 1985. The national confederation plans to maintain relations with the ILO and keep its membership in the Organization of African Trade Union Unity. The African- American labor center of AFL-CIO is preparing a technical assistance program for the confederation.

In the past, the ILO's Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations has raised questions about discrimination in employment based on political party affiliation and about forced labor in Guinea. During the June 1984 ILO conference, however, the Committee expressed the hope that Guinea in the future would be in a position to fulfill its obligations in regard to international labor conventions. The Guinean representative, referring to the change of government and the restructuring process underway, said the Government would be able to answer all questions next year.

There are no trade or professional associations in Guinea. The Government legalized private professions only in May 1984, and few professionals have yet established themselves. The Government has asked international and national trade and professional associations in other countries for help in organizing and developing Guinean associations.

c. Freedom of Religion

As before the April coup, all religions have the right to establish places of worship and maintain contacts with coreligionists in other countries. The former cabinet included a ministry of Islamic affairs, even though Islam is not the official religion of the state. The present Government has restructured that ministry, naming it the Ministry of Religious Affairs and creating a Christian affairs department. The minister is a Muslim leader. It has also invited Christian organizations in Guinea to reestablish the private schools which had been forced to close by the previous regime.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Freedom of movement within the country exists in Guinea, but all citizens are required to carry identity cards. Documents are often required for internal travel by foreigners but are readily obtainable and do not present unreasonable difficulties. Families and ethnic groups frequently are located across national borders, and substantial movement back and forth has been permitted in recent years. Legal entry into and exit from the country are subject to the usual passport and visa controls.

Immediately upon taking over the government, the CMRN invited refugees and those who had left for economic reasons to return to Guinea. Out of an estimated 1.5 million Guineans living in other countries, some 200,000 have returned since Sekou Toure's death, posing a heavy burden on the economy. The Government estimates at least 250,000 in all will eventually return and, to meet the emergency situation, was granted $1 million in supplies and medicines by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees for the remainder of 1984.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Until April 1984, a constitution provided for a single political party to rule the then People's Revolutionary Republic of Guinea. Former President Ahmed Sekou Toure controlled both the state and the single political party as president of the former and secretary-general of the latter. On taking control, the military abolished the Constitution, the government organs established under it, and the party. The nation's name was changed to the Republic of Guinea and a 25-man Military Committee for National Redressment (CMRN), with a 10-man executive bureau, was established to rule the country. A president, prime minister, and 39 cabinet members were named by the CMRN, as well as officials in charge of local, subprefectural, prefectural, provincial, and regional levels of government. (In a reorganization December 18, 1984, the Office of the Prime Minister was abolished and the Cabinet and CMRN reduced in numbers.) In all of these appointments an attempt was made to balance representation of the various ethnic groups in Guinea. The CMRN has spoken generally about a new constitution but has not yet announced any plans to allow political parties, democratic elections, or a return to civilian rule.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Before April 1984, Guinea did not play a human rights role in international bodies, and there were no human rights organizations in Guinea. Moreover, Guinea was criticized by Amnesty International in its 1984 and earlier reports, as indicated in Section 1.

Immediately after taking control of the government, the CMRN released all political prisoners and opened the infamous Camp Boiro to visitors and the international press. On April 28 the official newspaper, "Horoya," reproduced UNESCO's poster of the U.N.'s Universal Declaration of Human Rights in a two-page centerfold, and the posters were distributed for display in government offices and public buildings. On May 17, 1984, the Government signed the instrument of adhesion to the Convention of Geneva of 12 August 1949 and to additional protocols of the Convention. The spokesman for a three-person Amnesty International delegation that was in Guinea September 30-October 8 said publicly that governments rarely receive Amnesty as warmly and cooperatively as had Guinea. Delegation members were allowed to interview 1,000 former political detainees and their families, tour Camp Boiro, and visit the former governmental officials presently being detained in Kindia. Amnesty's International's report of its visit has not yet been released.

The Government has indicated its interest in receiving assistance from Senegalese expert, Birame N'Diaye, who was designated by the U.N.'s Human Rights Committee, to meet its reporting and other responsibilities relating to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. It has also invited representatives of the International League for Human Rights, which had been critical of the previous regime's human rights policies in its "Guinea's Human Rights Record" published in July 1983, to visit Guinea.

The former regime had published a decree dated January 26, 1984 establishing a Guinean Red Crescent Society as a branch of the International Committee of the Red Cross. The present Minister of Public Health reaffirmed the establishment of the organization in a proclamation dated June 20, 1984. An international official arrived in Guinea in September 1984 and is in the process of setting up Red Crescent offices throughout the country.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Guinea's population is 5.6 million and its per capita gross national product reached $305 in 1982. This figure does not reflect the fact that only about 150,000 Guineans, approximately one-third of the 440,000 employed in the industry and services sector, are registered wage earners. The remainder are private sector artisans and traders, who either sell their goods for sylis (local currency) at the unofficial rate of exchange, or trade them for foodstuffs and consumer goods on the parallel market. Registered wage earners (employees of state enterprises, semiprivate joint ventures, and government ministries) are allowed to purchase essential foodstuffs (rice, cooking oil, flour, sugar, meat, and fish) at heavily subsidized prices. The rural sector, which comprises most of Guinea's population, is essentially outside the national money economy and is largely self-sufficient in foodstuffs.

The liberalization of commerce begun in the late 1970's brought more foodstuffs and consumer goods in the parallel market, which the previous government tolerated. The influx of these goods has increased under the new Government, which allows private traders to import and sell goods at whatever price the open market will bear, as long as they use their own sources of foreign exchange outside the central banking system.

Agricultural development is one of Guinea's major goals. The previous government devoted the largest share (26 percent) of its last five-year plan budget to the agro-pastoral sector by investing heavily in collectivized state farms. Agricultural development and food production, however, continued to lag. The new Government abolished the state farms and has announced its intention to support the small private farmer. To meet this objective, the Government has called on all friendly countries for assistance and is preparing a new development plan to address the major impediments to agricultural productivity, which include the lack of price incentives, appropriate technology, infrastructure, and credit to small farmers.

The economy's ability to meet human needs has changed only slightly in recent years, according to limited available statistics. In 1977 the calorie supply available for consumption relative to nutritional requirements was 84 percent. Life expectancy at birth was estimated to be 44 years in 1982 and 41 in 1984. The infant mortality rate declined slightly from 165 per 1,000 in 1980 to 156 in 1984, but is still relatively high compared with that of earlier years (141 per 1,000 in 1968). Low nutritional standards and sanitary conditions prevailing throughout most of the country are largely responsible for infant mortality.

The overall population growth rate has held at about 2.7 percent in recent years. About 44 percent of the urban population has access to a safe water supply, but this drops to 2.5 percent for the rural population. With the assistance of foreign donors, the Government has an ambitious nationwide program for improving the rural population's access to safe water and construction of wells, springs, and canals in the fouta djallon and kankan regions.

With assistance from France and neighboring countries, the CMRN is reorganizing the entire education system to eliminate ideology based on the writings and declarations of former President Sekou Toure and to upgrade the quality of the system. The reorganization involves a complete overhaul of administration, infrastructure, curricula, textbooks, and teaching personnel. Public education is to be free and universal, and private schools will again be allowed. French is being restored as the language of instruction in primary schools. One of the CMRN's goals is to increase enrollment in primary schools, which was estimated in 1980 to be 40 percent of boys and 19 percent of girls for a total of 29 percent of school age children.

Women in Guinea have enjoyed a special status as a result of the important political role they played prior to independence. Guinean women are represented in all professions from civil engineering to the national police and armed forces. An office of women's affairs has been established in the Ministry of Social Affairs. The majority of students enrolled in the national medical college have been women. The Government's health-care policies have stressed prevention and child and mother care, but the quality of care has been low owing to inadequate facilities and medical supplies. Improvement of the national health sector is also one of the CMRN's priorities.

GUINEA-BISSAU

The Republic of Guinea-Bissau returned to a form of constitutional government in 1984. In May, the armed forces-dominated Revolutionary Council, which had ruled the country since the 1980 coup d'etat, was abolished. Following legislative elections controlled by the country's only legal political party--the African Party for the Independence of Guinea and Cape Verde--the 150-member National Popular Assembly reconvened for the first time since 1980. The assembly approved a new Constitution, elected General Joao Bernardo Vieira to a five-year term as President of the Council of State, and chose the 14 other members of that Council. Despite these changes, effective political power remains concentrated in the hands of the council and President Vieira who currently serves as Head of State, Head of Government, Armed Forces Commander-in-Chief, and Secretary-General of the party. The Council includes seven military men and five former members of the now defunct Revolutionary Council. All Council members are also members of the party's political and/or central committee.

Opposition political activity is not permitted. Under the May 1984 Constitution, the party is "the guiding political force of Guinea-Bissau society and the state." Elections at the district, regional, and national level are controlled by the party.

The armed forces remain the dominant element in state security. The military's role in the maintenance of internal security and public order is specifically mandated in the new Constitution. The creation of special tribunals is constitutionally prohibited except with respect to military courts established to deal with military offenses.

Guinea-Bissau is one of the world's poorest and least developed nations. The colonial heritage and inappropriate past economic, financial, and commercial policies have severely restricted growth and the exploitation of national resources. All economic activity is supervised by the Government through a system of state-owned business and commercial entities. There is a small private retail sector. Per capita gross national product (GNP) is, according to 1982 estimates, approximately $170 a year. Direct foreign grant assistance is required to cover a large portion of the Government's current operating budget. Imports and exports declined in 1984.

The inherent nature of the one-party state clearly limits the political freedom of Guinea-Bissauans. Nevertheless, the May 1984 Constitution guarantees the equality of all citizens before the law, as well as freedom of thought, assembly, association, and religion. The integrity of the individual is normally respected, except in cases involving alleged national security offenses. Efforts continue to reduce the degree of arbitrariness in the system, as reflected in the return to constitutional government after over three years of provisional rule by a revolutionary council and suspension of the previous constitution. A number of cabinet ministers were dismissed in 1984 on charges of malfeasance, and in March the Prime Minister was charged with coup plotting. Their cases continue under investigation but none is currently under detention.

GUINEA BISSAU

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no cases of government ordered or sanctioned assassinations nor have there been any terrorist incidents in 1984.

b. Disappearance

There were no known cases of disappearance in 1984.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There were no reported cases of torture in 1984. The May 1984 Constitution prohibits such treatment. Prison conditions are poor and unsanitary. Interrogation methods are at times harsh, entailing intimidation and occasionally solitary confinement. Medical treatment, medicines, and food for prisoners are in short supply. Military security and police officials are poorly trained.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

There is no published civil or criminal code. Habeas corpus (as a carryover from the Portuguese Penal Code) does exist in practice in urban areas, but is not generally observed in rural areas where a wide variety of traditional law prevails. In national security cases, arrests and detentions frequently take place without formal safeguards. Bail procedures appear not to exist. There were no known cases of government-imposed exile in 1984. The new Constitution, however, does recognize the state's right to expel and extradite Guinea-Bissauan citizens "in some cases."

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

In rural areas, nonpolitical offenders in other than the most important criminal and civil cases are often tried outside the formal court system, under traditional law. The private practice of law is prohibited. Defendants are assigned legal assistants from the Ministry of Justice when available. The judiciary is not independent. The civilian court system is essentially a continuation of that which existed under Portuguese colonial rule. The Supreme Court is the highest civilian court of appeal. Regional military courts have jurisdiction over military, militia, and security personnel on military missions. The Supreme Court has jurisdiction over more serious crimes such as acts against state security, attempts against the lives of party members, treason, and piracy. It is also an appeal court for the regional military courts. The interval between arrest and trial may be lengthy. There are no known political prisoners at this time.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution guarantees the inviolability of domicile, person, and correspondence. These guarantees are not always respected in the case of serious crimes or matters involving state security, when the observance of legal protections such as the need for search warrants and the definition of who can issue and serve them are considered less important than results. Absent an independent judiciary and a published criminal code, there is no established or guaranteed protection against intrusion by the state into the private lives of individuals. International and domestic mail and other forms of communication are considered insecure. Opposition to the Government and public criticism of government officials are prohibited. However, intrusion into the daily life of ordinary citizens by the Government is the exception rather than the rule--save at times of great political tension or in cases involving national security.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The information media in Guinea-Bissau are owned and controlled by the Government. Independent reporting or editorial comment on domestic or international affairs does not exist. There are no independent journals or newspapers. Coverage of food shortages and the current economic crisis is, however, common. Journalism is considered a function of the state and the party. No expression of political opposition to the party or the Government is permitted.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

All organizations and associations in Guinea-Bissau are integral parts of the state or the party. The national labor union is a "mass-action" organ of the party. It claims 20,000 members. It is forbidden to organize public employees--a prohibition dating from colonial days. Strikes, while not formally illegal, have not taken place, and the vast majority of salaried workers are employees of the state. Opposition to government policies is prohibited. There are no non-government or non-party associations affiliated with international bodies. The national union is a member of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity and is affiliated with the Communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is no religious discrimination and religious freedom is constitutionally guaranteed. The majority of the population is animist, but other religious groups exist and their worship is unimpeded. Religious missions operate secular activities throughout the country. Parochial schools operate openly. Conversion is permitted. The adherence to a particular faith appears to be neither an advantage nor a disadvantage to individuals in their secular activities. Muslims account for approximately 30 percent of the active religious community.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no routine restrictions on movement within the country. Exit permits, however, are required for Guinea-Bissauan nationals and for many foreign expatriate workers traveling abroad. Citizens are not required to obtain special permits for internal travel. Travel is restricted when interregional smuggling of agricultural products is suspected. The principal constraints on foreign travel are economic.

GUINEA BISSAU

There are no known bars to emigration. Since the country's borders are not rigidly controlled, there is a considerable amount of unauthorized cross-border movement. There are no significant refugee groups in Guinea-Bissau. The Government is generally sympathetic to the principle of asylum. There were no known repatriation problems in 1984.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Guinea-Bissau is governed by a small elite group of party leaders and military authorities led by President Joao Bernardo Vieira. In terms of the 1984 Constitution, all political activity must take place within the party/state structure. The 1984 electoral slates at the district, regional, and national levels were party-prepared lists. Write-in or opposition candidates were not permitted. The President, members of the Council of State, and National Popular Assembly deputies are elected to five-year terms. There are provisions for constitutional revision and national referendums. In rural areas, popular criticism of regional government authorities has forced the Government to replace some officials. No single ethnic group dominates party/government positions. The party and Government actively encourage the role of women in society, public life, and development. The President of the National Assembly and the Mayor of Bissau are both women. Foreign nationals residing in Guinea-Bissau are generally constitutionally entitled to the same rights as citizens except for the right to vote or to hold public office.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Guinea-Bissau has not been active in international or regional human rights bodies, and there have been no visits by such groups in 1984. It has no record of sustained involvement with outside bodies concerned with human rights. Amnesty International in 1984 and previous reports expressed concern about earlier detentions without trial of officials of the former administration arrested after the 1980 coup. All of these detainees, however, have since been released. Freedom House rates Guinea-Bissau as "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Guinea-Bissau is among the least developed countries in the world. According to World Bank statistics, the current population is estimated at 842,000 with a population growth rate of 1.9 percent. The Government estimates the population growth rate to be 2.2. percent, with average family size at 5.3 persons. Per capita gross national product is estimated at $170 a year. Life expectancy at birth is 38 years, and the infant mortality rate is approximately 139 per 1,000 live births. The World Bank estimates adult literacy at 19 percent, but the Government puts overall literacy at not more than 15 percent. No more than 12 percent of the population has access to safe water. Eighty-seven percent of the population lives in communal villages (tabancas), which are the country's basic economic and social units. The remaining 13 percent of the population is concentrated largely in and around the capital city of Bissau. Average population density is 22 inhabitants per square kilometer. The Government estimates that there is one hospital bed for every 650 inhabitants and one doctor per 10,000 inhabitants. Of an active population of approximately 450,000, only 25,000 are salaried wage earners. Most of these are civil servants.

Employment and educational opportunities are limited. Primary school enrollment is estimated at 71 percent. Although the country is extremely fertile, less than one-half of the arable land is currently under cultivation. Guinea-Bissau's principal natural resources include fish, lumber, some minerals, and possibly petroleum. The economy is dominated by the traditional subsistence production of agricultural commodities. The rural and modern sectors operate, to a large extent, independently of one another. Foreign economic assistance to Guinea-Bissau is substantial, averaging $60-80 million annually.

There is no government or party discrimination against women. The National Women's Movement, a party organization, is active nationally. Women hold some senior government and party positions. Political activity by women is officially encouraged at all levels. By statute, party organizations must have a stated proportion of women office holders. Official discrimination against women in the modern sector of society does not take place. In most rural sectors, however, traditional male-dominant sociological practices prevail, imposing attendant limitations on women.

IVORY COAST

Ivory Coast, which attained independence from France in 1960, is a paternalistic civilian one-party state. Power is concentrated in the Democratic Party of Ivory Coast, whose long-time leader is President Felix Houphouet-Boigny. Although the formation of other parties is theoretically guaranteed by the Constitution, in practice no other party is allowed. More open discussion of government policies has been permitted in the four years since the country's first competitive elections for local party, municipal, and legislative positions in 1980.

Ivory Coast has had considerable economic development since independence; however, poverty still prevails in much of the country. The Ivorian economy is market-oriented and open to foreign investment. Until recently steady economic growth had permitted appreciable annual improvement in the standard of living throughout the country and contributed to widespread support for the policies of the Government. However, over the last three years, Ivory Coast has been squeezed by a heavy debt burden and low prices for its export products on world markets. The austerity measures which government has introduced to offset this reduced income have been widely, but not completely, accepted. The President advocates "dialogue" in settling disputes, generally seeking to involve dissenters in the operation of the Ivorian system rather than isolate or imprison them.

In late 1983, the President lifted the ban on the secondary school teachers' union which had resulted from an unauthorized strike earlier in the year. An official investigation into corruption in the government housing program prompted by the teachers' strike resulted in the trial and conviction of a number of government officials. There are no political prisoners in Ivory Coast, and there has never been an execution of political opponents. There is no history of violent action against specific ethnic or religious minorities, although riots directed at foreign Africans have occurred in the past. Detainees, especially foreign Africans, are routinely treated roughly by the Surete Nationale and the Gendarmerie upon arrest.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There have never been reports of politically-motivated killing by either the Government or by opposition groups in Ivory Coast.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of abduction or disappearance of individuals by forces with official sanction.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Ivorian penal code prohibits the use of violence by official means without justification. The code does not, however, specifically mention or prohibit torture nor does it define what constitutes "legitimate justification" or the level of violence officials may use. There were no reports of torture during 1984. Systematically cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment of individuals or prison inmates is not thought to occur routinely, but foreign Africans are treated more roughly by police than are Ivorian detainees. Since the beginning of a government-sponsored anti-crime campaign in 1983, some detainees, primarily foreign Africans, were reportedly denied adequate food and drink, beaten by police and forced to do menial labor. Prisoners are allowed visits from attorneys of their choice and from family members, who must provide food to supplement the sparse prison diet. Prisons are crowded and conditions poor. Sanitation and medical facilities are limited. There is no evidence of discriminatory treatment of prisoners on the basis of sex, ethnicity, race, or type of crime, once they are committed to prison.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Ivorian Constitution and pertinent statutes prohibit arbitrary arrest or imprisonment. People are not detained, punished, or tried for expression of views critical of or different from those of the Government; but the Government has occasionally detained a few individuals it believes to be security threats. It also takes firm non-violent measures against acts it considers threats to internal security. The Government has used the threat of forced conscription to discourage student involvement in anti-government activities. It has arrested student demonstrators, most recently in 1982.

Under the Ivorian penal code, a public prosecutor can detain a suspect for up to 48 hours without bringing charges. During the anti-crime campaign of 1983, several thousand individuals were detained under this provision for identity checks, and many were apparently held beyond the legal maximum. The identity checks continued during 1984 but on a smaller scale. The code dictates that further detention be ordered by a magistrate who can authorize periods up to four months but must provide the Minister of Justice a monthly written explanation of why detention should be continued.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Ivorian law establishes the right to a fair public trial. This provision is generally respected in urban centers. In rural areas justice is often administered at the village level through traditional institutions. The judiciary is independent of the executive and military. Defendants have the right to legal counsel, and the judicial system provides for court-appointed attorneys for indigent defendants. In practice, however, such attorneys are not readily available. The court of appeals hears appeals of verdicts of civilian courts. Civilians are not tried by military courts. There is no structure of appeals courts within the military justice system. Persons convicted by a military tribunal occasionally request the Supreme Court to set aside the tribunal's verdict and order a retrial. There are no known political prisoners in Ivory Coast.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

With few exceptions, all Ivorian citizens are considered to be members of the Democratic Party of Ivory Coast. Party regulations call for active participation in party activities and payment of dues; however, these regulations are not strictly enforced. Ivorians who choose not to participate do not suffer retaliation. It is not known what percentage of the population actively participates in the party. The code of penal procedures specifies that a police official or investigation magistrate may conduct searches of homes without a warrant if he has reason to believe there is evidence concerning a crime on the premises. The official must have the prosecutor's agreement to retain any objects seized in the search. He is required to have witnesses to the search, which may not take place between the hours of 9:00 p.m. and 4:00 a.m. Legal safeguards against arbitrary searches are generally respected in the modern parts of cities. In less-developed urban sectors and in rural areas, legal safeguards are sometimes ignored. There were no reports of forced entry or other violations of the home during 1984. Monitoring of correspondence and telephone conversations is not widely practiced.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Despite Ivory Coast's established one-party state, there is a large measure of freedom of speech. Critics of the Government feel free to express themselves in informal situations, among Ivorians and foreigners alike, without fear of reprisal. Limits--such as cancellation of gatherings--are occasionally placed on the expression of controversial views in public forums. As a result of 1982 student disorders, only apolitical gatherings are now permitted on campus, but students still speak freely about politics in informal situations.

The country's one daily newspaper is owned by private interests, but its editorial opinion follows the policies of the country's single political party. The one weekly news magazine is controlled by the party. The Ministry of Information operates a wire service, radio, and television. Government policy assigns the media a positive role in promoting national unity and development. It allows criticism of failures of policy execution but not of policies themselves. Investigative journalism of government policies and administration is not permitted, but other types of investigative reporting are allowed. In January 1984, the Government banned a publication entitled "Islam and Ivory Coast." It identified the author as an Ivorian student. Although not officially banned, a book published in 1983 entitled "Ivory Coast: For a Democratic Alternative" by a dissident Ivorian professor is not publicly available in the country. In September 1984, the leadership of the party issued an official statement denouncing an anti-government tract circulating in Abidjan. A certain segment of Ivorian society does not feel free to express openly its views. Foreign publications are readily available, but occasional issues which are particularly critical of the Ivorian Government, the party, or the President are seized.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of assembly is generally respected in Ivory Coast except when the Government perceives a significant and immediate danger to public order. In such cases, it prohibits meetings and arrests persons disregarding its orders. The majority of unions are organized and directed by a government-sponsored union confederation, the General Union of Ivory Coast Workers (UGTCI), the leader of which occupies a senior position in the party hierarchy. Membership is encouraged but not mandatory. The UGTCI is a relatively passive coordination mechanism rather than an active campaigner for workers' rights. The right to strike exists in theory, but in practice legal strikes are rarely authorized. The 1983 secondary teachers' strike was broken by a presidential decree ordering teachers back to the classrooms and threatening them with prison sentences and fines for non-compliance. Generally the Government negotiates with strikers and resolves at least some of their economic grievances. There have been no reports that professional groups have experienced persecution or harassment. The Government, however, attempts to bring such groups under its wing or that of the party so as to exercise control over their activities. Unions, trade associations and professional bodies are permitted to maintain relations with recognized international professional bodies in their fields. The UGTCI is a member of the continent-wide Organization of African Trade Union Unity (OATUU).

c. Freedom of Religion

There are no known impediments to religious expression in Ivory Coast. There is no dominant religion, and no particular faith is favored for advancement. The open practice of religion is permitted, and there are no restrictions on religious ceremonies or teaching.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Ivorian Government exercises minimal control over domestic travel. Ivorians can freely travel abroad and emigrate without discrimination. Internal road blocks for identity checks are common. Ivorians have the right of voluntary repatriation. There are no known cases of revocation of citizenship. Ivory Coast's refugee and asylum practices are liberal. The country has resettled or granted safehaven to Angolans, Eritreans, Guineans, Liberians, Indo-Chinese, Voltans, and Ghanaians. While in Ivory Coast, they receive one-year renewable resident visas for their first five years in the country, after which they may apply for permanent resident status. Ivory Coast does not take any significant responsibility for the economic and social welfare of refugees.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Political participation in Ivory Coast is limited to the Democratic Party of Ivory Coast, which is headed by President Houphouet-Boigny. Although the Constitution provides for multiple political parties, the country is in practice a one-party state. No opposition groups exist openly, and their formation is discouraged. Within the party, the President operates through a 9-member executive committee, a 30-member political bureau, and a 100-member steering committee. Political power is concentrated in the President's hands and most important decisions are made by the President himself. Within this strictly observed one-party system, the Ivorian Government has encouraged recently more open participation in the political process. In the 1980 legislative, municipal, and local party elections, any citizen could present himself as a candidate, and approximately 650 individuals ran for election to the National Assembly. The party played no role in choosing candidates or administering the elections. Intense competition took place in all three elections in which all citizens were eligible to vote. About 50 percent of top local party officials were voted out of office, and only 27 incumbent deputies were re-elected to the 147-member National Assembly. As a result of this process, current National Assembly members work more vigorously in their constituents' interest than their predecessors did, and debate within that body is more vigorous and well publicized than was the case before 1980.

Public criticism of basic government policies or of the party and the President rarely occurs, although abuses of the execution of policy--as in corruption cases--are publicized. The party-controlled press often reproaches individuals who criticize policy, although private criticism is common and tolerated.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government has been cooperative toward inquiries into its human rights situation. Ivory Coast has a chapter of Amnesty International. The last inquiry occurred in 1981 and concerned a published report by Amnesty International in Paris that the Government had drafted striking television employees into the army as a form of extrajudicial punishment. The Government at first maintained that these men were simply doing their duty as conscripts. Later, the men appeared in uniform on national television and were told they were being returned to civilian life. Amnesty International did not include an entry on the Ivory Coast in its 1984 Report. Freedom House terms Ivory Coast "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Ivory Coast's population has reached 9.6 million (1984) with an average annual growth rate of 4 percent (1960-82) and per capita gross national product (GNP) estimated at $953 (1982).

The population includes at least two million foreign Africans, perhaps as many as 100,000 Lebanese and 37,000 French, and a small number of other Europeans, North Americans, and Asians. A great disparity exists between the standard of living of expatriates and the African elites on one hand, and the urban poor and villagers on the other. Nonetheless, there is a sizeable, growing urban Ivorian middle class, and living conditions in the villages have improved markedly and steadily during Ivory Coast's 24 years as an independent state. Most villages have wells, and at least three years of primary education are offered in all but the smallest villages. The country has constructed an excellent nationwide network of paved highways and nearly all Ivorians have access to motorized transportation.

Life expectancy at birth is 48.15 years (1984). The country's infant mortality rate is 119 per 1,000 live births (1984), and its adult literacy rate is 35 percent (1980). Nineteen percent of the population (1976) has access to safe drinking water, and the ratio of calorie supply available for consumption relative to nutritional requirement was 108.01 in 1977. Ivory Coast has a substantial degree of food self-sufficiency. While perhaps 50 percent of the rice, 75 percent of red meat, and 100 percent of the wheat is imported, ample supplies of traditional starches, vegetables, fish, and other proteins are available and affordable. Although malnutrition sometimes occurs, it is largely due to nutritional ignorance and/or distribution problems rather than an overall lack of food.

Three years of recession and negative GNP growth, coupled with government austerity measures (e.g. civil service salary freezes and reduced perquisites), have substantially reduced both purchasing power and the Government's ability to provide services that Ivorians had come to expect. Education absorbs some 30-40 percent of the operating budget and is generally available to all children, Ivorian and foreign, boys and girls. The primary school enrollment, as a percentage of children of primary school age, was 74 percent in 1979. Health, by contrast, absorbs only seven percent of the operating budget and is less widely distributed than educational services.

Better-paying government and private sector jobs seem to be concentrated among the minority Muslim (25 percent) and Christian (15 percent) populations, a phenomenon more related to urbanization and access to education than to a systematic pattern of discrimination. On the other hand, the government's policy of Ivorianization requires that all positions be offered to Ivorians before foreigners; this keeps foreign Africans from most wage and salary jobs in the modern sector. Individuals have property rights and these tend to be protected, at least in urban areas. In rural areas land tenure and possibly other property rights are often dictated by tribal custom.

Although males clearly play the preponderant role overall, some Ivorian traditional societies accord women considerable political and economic power. In rural areas tribal customs dictate the division of tasks and these sometimes fall heavily on women. Female circumcision continues to be practiced among elements of the Ivorian population, although it is rare in urban populations. Official party policy is to encourage full participation by women in social, economic, and political life. The Government has a Ministry of Women's Affairs (without a minister for nearly a year) for this purpose. Women remain very lightly represented at the higher levels of government and the party.

KENYA

Kenya has been a single-party state since 1982. The President, Daniel arap Moi, exercises firm control over both the Government and the party, the Kenyan African National Union (KANU). Since the attempted August 1, 1982, coup, KANU has become a more powerful vehicle for political maneuvering and persuasion, especially following the recent "purge" of longstanding KANU members alleged to have been disloyal to the Government or presidency. To date 17 people have been expelled from the party (15 during 1984), making them ineligible for public office. President Moi has also directed that effective January 1, 1985, all Kenyan civil servants must be party members. Within the evolving one-party system, there is still considerable competition for parliamentary seats. In the September 1983 elections, over 900 candidates competed for 258 seats.

The President also consolidated political power in 1984, in part through his balancing of ethnic groupings. The lengthy judicial hearing into the alleged wrongdoing of former Constitutional Affairs Minister Charles Njonjo, himself a Kikuyu, has had the effect of accentuating the Kikuyu-versus-non-Kikuyu split. Njonjo was removed from office in 1983 and accused of acts of treason against the Government, bribery, corruption, consorting with "enemy powers," and exhibiting personal disloyalty to the President. The published findings of the commission of inquiry listed a number of acts for which Njonjo might have been jailed. However, on December 12, Kenya's National Day, President Moi issued a full pardon to Njonjo, although the defendant had never been convicted of any crime.

In 1984, Kenyan security and military forces became involved in several major border incidents. In February 1984 Government troops allegedly killed several hundred ethnic Somali tribesmen while attempting to restore order in the turbulent Northeast Province. The Government publicly acknowledged its error although it maintains only 57 people were killed. Kenyan troops also supported Ugandan forces against Pokot and Karamajong warriors in eastern Uganda in March and April 1984.

Kenya's fragile economy is experiencing a series of difficult problems: the most serious drought in its history; steadily rising unemployment (400,000 job seekers after at best 20,000 new jobs each year); a population rapidly expanding at over 4 percent a year; and inefficient public corporations which control prices and distribution of major commodities. Moreover, a trend towards disinvestment may be emerging. At year's end the number of U.S. firms represented in Nairobi was approximately 125, down from 130 in 1983. Weak sales prospects in Kenya and East Africa regionally appear to be the principal reason for the declining foreign presence and investment.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Kenya does not sanction or practice unlawful or arbitrary deprivation of life and there were no reports of political killings in 1984.

b. Disappearance

The Government does not sanction or practice secret arrests, abductions, or other types of disappearances. However, the authorities have not been able to prevent the frequently reported kidnapping of Ugandan refugees by Ugandan intelligence operatives in Nairobi. Apparently, most of these abducted persons are forced to return to Uganda, where they are jailed without trial. In April 1984, the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) called the matter to the attention of senior Kenyan officials, but still reports of incidents continued throughout 1984.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture is specifically forbidden under the Kenyan Constitution, and allegations that Kenyan authorities use torture are usually investigated. However, actions by security forces in the Northeast Province in February 1984 resulted in extensive killings. Responding to fighting between Degodia tribesmen over water rights, the army and police used excessive force in reestablishing order and reportedly, in the process, subjected tribesmen to humiliation and torture. The Government admitted that some officials "had exceeded their instructions" and subsequently dismissed the Provincial Commissioner. A report of the investigation has not been published, but the Government claimed there were 57 deaths, not the hundreds first reported. In 1982, the Government utilized, for the first time since President Moi assumed office in 1978, the Preservation of Public Security Act, which includes regulations superseding constitutional safeguards. For example, persons formally detained under the provisions of the Act are held in solitary confinement, where they are allowed almost no contact with the outside world, including their attorneys or families. Amnesty International in its 1984 report expressed concern over poor prison conditions and treatment of detainees.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Preservation of Public Security Act empowers the state to undertake, without reference to the judiciary, detention without trial for an unlimited period, or other actions to control the activities of individuals which would otherwise be regarded as lawful. Since resuming the practice of detention in 1982, the Government has formally detained or restricted 13 persons under the Act. Ten were released in 1984. Many other Kenyans have been held without being formally detained or charged. Current detainees include a journalist and Kenya's former deputy director of intelligence.

Aside from the unprecedented circumstances created by the attempted coup in August 1982, however, habeas corpus has generally been available in Kenya. Kenyan law requires that persons charged with crimes be brought biweekly before judicial authorities in public court to ensure that investigations are carried out in a timely manner and that prisoners are not mistreated. Approximately 5,000 prisoners, jailed for minor offenses, were released by presidential pardon in 1984.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The judiciary usually exhibits considerable independence but, in cases involving detention under the Preservation of Public Security Act, its authority is limited to ensuring compliance with procedural provisions only. Aside from public security detention cases, the right to a fair public trial is usually observed in Kenya. Civilians are tried in civilian courts and, in all cases, verdicts may be appealed to the Kenyan high court.

Military personnel are tried by military courts and verdicts may be appealed. Most sentences meted out as a result of the August 1982 coup attempt either have been reduced or suspended. No executions of persons allegedly involved in the coup attempt have been carried out. An Amnesty International observer attended three of the six student trials in 1983 and reported that the proceedings appeared to have been conducted in accordance with internationally recognized standards. More than 60 university students had been arrested in August 1982 following the coup attempt; all but six were granted presidential clemency in February 1983.

The major judicial event in 1984 was the inquiry into the official conduct of the former Minister of Constitutional Affairs, Charles Njonjo, a leading Kikuyu and former close associate of the President. Njonjo was removed from office in 1983 and accused of treason and corruption. After many months and 109 judicial review sessions, amid much publicity, the judicial inquiry ended soon after Njonjo took the witness stand in his own defense. Despite a commission of inquiry finding that Njonjo had committed jailable offenses, he was not brought to trial, and on December 12 he was given a full presidential pardon.

Members of the press regularly attend and report on court proceedings whether civilian or military, as in the Njonjo case and the proceedings after the August 1982 coup attempt.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The sanctity of the home is generally respected in Kenya, but security officials sometimes do conduct unwarranted or illegal searches to seize allegedly stolen property or apprehend suspected criminals.

Correspondence with prisoners is monitored, censored, and frequently not delivered. Security officials are invariably present when prisoners or detainees consult with family members or attorneys. Reportedly, security forces occasionally employ surveillance techniques and electronic invasion of the home.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and the press are proclaimed in the Constitution. In practice, however, these freedoms can be, and have been, narrowly interpreted by Kenyan authorities (e.g., during the 1983 election campaign candidates were prohibited from discussing the Charles Njonjo "traitor affair" in public). The existence and use of the detention provisions of the Preservation of Public Security Act inhibit public exchange of views on political subjects. Kenya has no formal censorship of the local press, but government pressure has in the past been brought to bear on journalists and publications which stray too far from the government line. Official party daily newspapers in English and Kiswahili were established in 1983, thus tacitly reducing the leeway available to other publications in discussing public issues.

The September 19, 1984, issue of the London Financial Times, which included a supplement on Kenya, was not permitted into the country, probably because the Government did not concur with items appearing in the publication.

The Government also discourages students and faculty from political activism. However, three university lecturers, formally detained prior to the August 1, 1982 coup attempt, were released from custody in 1984. Kenya's institutions of higher education were closed immediately following the coup attempt and were reopened only on October 3, 1983.

Kenya has a 30-member film censorship board under the auspices of the Ministry of Culture and Social Services. The board must approve all films shown in Kenya, but a wide variety of uncut foreign films is regularly available. A 10-member television censorship board has established precepts which govern what can be shown on television.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Although the Kenyan Constitution formally sanctions freedom of assembly and association, these rights are sometimes limited by the Public Order and Police Act, which gives local administrative authorities wide powers to control public gatherings. It is an offense to convene an unlicensed meeting, and politicians known to be at odds with central authorities have been investigated for violations of this statute. Nonetheless, licenses for public meetings are rarely denied, and then usually on the grounds that the proposed meeting might generate civil disorder. The Government occasionally has prevented political, religious, and social meetings under the Societies Act.

Forced membership in political organizations is not practiced. Candidates for public office, however, must be members of the party. According to a recent presidential directive, all civil servants must also be party members effective January 1985.

Kenya has a relatively free trade union movement. Its single trade union confederation, the Central Organization of Trade Unions, is affiliated with the Ghana-based, continent-wide, Organization of African Trade Union Unity. Complex labor legislation renders virtually all strikes illegal. Strikes are permitted only if the Ministry of Labor has not taken action within 21 days after the formal declaration of a dispute to have it resolved. The only major strike in the past decade occurred in February 1984, when Nairobi's 8,000 woodworkers went on a one-week strike, which was quickly mediated by the Ministry of Labor. Wildcat strikes of no more than a day or two in length are quite common. Most disputes, however, are settled by the parties concerned. Kenya's dispute mechanism is centered in the Industrial Relations Court, founded in 1964. All Kenyan wage earners are subject to Government regulations limiting wage increases. Nevertheless, some unions have had notable success in obtaining salary adjustments for union members by filing litigation before the Industrial Court. Some unions have also obtained significant additional worker benefits, such as expanded health insurance coverage and increased housing allowances. All collective agreements must be approved by the Industrial Court before they can take effect. The Court has since become the model for several other such labor courts in Africa. Although the Court's case load has risen significantly over the years, it still dispenses justice quickly and fairly.

In August 1980, the Government formally disbanded the Kenyan Civil Servants Union (at that time Kenya's largest union) because of its alleged political activities. The Public Service International has continued to press for a genuine civil servants' union, given Kenya's membership in the International Labor Organization and its having signed the Convention on the Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining. In December 1984, President Moi announced that a civil servants association could be formed, but under government guidelines.

All permanent workers in private enterprise of at least seven persons may be organized into trade unions. Approximately three-quarters of all such enterprise employees are unionized, and about half (300,000) pay voluntary union dues. Unions actually represent a greater number in collective bargaining because non-union workers are covered by collective agreements negotiated for their enterprise. Agreements are usually of two years' duration. A few professional voluntary organizations, such as the Law Society of Kenya (i.e., the Kenyan bar association), exist, but such associations do not conduct themselves as trade unions.

c. Freedom of Religion

A wide range of religious freedoms exists in Kenya, and freedom of worship is protected by the Constitution. However, the Government has often criticized church officials for meddling in politics and can refuse to register any religious society or group which it believes may pursue activities harmful to public security. The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints (Mormons) has been trying without success to obtain registration under the Societies Act for the past three years. The Government has not registered any churches during that period, but it has not interfered with Mormon meetings.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Preservation of Public Security Act provides for the legal restriction of movement within Kenya of persons considered to be a danger to public security. Between October 1982 and October 1983, Oginga Odinga, former Vice President and a leading politician known for his outspoken opposition to the central Government, was restricted (first to his city, and then to his home) under this Act.

Following the August 1, 1982, coup attempt, the Kenyan Government expanded bureaucratic requirements necessary for travel abroad. These additional hurdles have had a negative impact upon study and research opportunities abroad for Kenyan university students and faculty. Kenya does not, however, formally prohibit emigration of its nationals. Kenyan citizens may not travel to the Republic of South Africa.

Although Kenya suffers from high and increasing unemployment, it continues to accept refugees. During 1984, Kenya's official refugee population increased by approximately 25 percent to about 7,400 documented resident refugees. Of these, over 90 percent are Ethiopian, Ugandan, or Rwandan. In addition to those individuals who obtained official refugee status, between 3,000 and 10,000 additional persons have taken refuge in Kenya unofficially. The Government continues to work with the Nairobi office of the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR). Kenya also generally respects the right of voluntary repatriation, although there have been lengthy delays in granting repatriation permits to foreign-owned businesses.

In addition to the problem of controlling cross-border abductions of Ugandans (see 1 b), a significant blot appeared on Kenya's otherwise good refugee record in the autumn of 1983, when the Governments of Kenya and Tanzania forcibly repatriated some two dozen of their respective nationals who had settled in each other's country as political refugees. Many of the individuals had been recognized as refugees by both governments and the UNHCR. The exchange was viewed by some foreign governments and by the UNHCR as a violation of refugee rights and agreements. UNHCR officials made representations to the Kenyan and Tanzanian Governments. Subsequently, Kenyan officials indicated that such enforced repatriations would not occur again.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The Chief of State, President Moi, supported by a small group of advisors, controls all aspects of policy-making and has increasingly consolidated political power, especially since the attempted coup of August 1, 1982. Kenya became a de jure one-party state on June 9, 1982, and, even though a wide range of candidates and views is generally permitted, elections have not been immune to Government manipulation. However, within the one-party system, campaigns and balloting are ordinarily conducted in a generally free, fair, and peaceful manner. The number of candidates for a particular public office is frequently a half dozen or more, and in the September 16, 1983, general elections up to 15 candidates ran for a single parliamentary seat. Of the 995 persons who applied for KANU party clearance to run for Parliament, 992 were permitted to stand. Of these, roughly 700 ultimately had their names placed on the ballot.

The Kenyan Government encourages but does not coerce the electorate to vote. Turnout has generally averaged between 60 and 70 percent of the eligible electorate, but it fell to just 42 percent in 1983.

Incumbents are frequently voted out of office in Kenya. Since Kenya's independence in 1963, as many as 50 percent of the country's sitting parliamentarians have been defeated during a single election. Last year, the Kenyan electorate rejected approximately 35 percent of Kenya's incumbent parliamentarians, including 5 ministers and 18 assistant ministers. It should be noted, however, that in Kenya's post-independence history neither the President nor the Vice President has ever faced an opposing candidate.

President Moi has expanded tribal representation in the Government and legislature. Members of all ethnic groups are permitted to contest for office, and Kenya has one white Parliamentarian who was reelected in a constituency that is 99 percent black African, despite the presence of several black African candidates on the ballot. Ten different tribes hold cabinet portfolios in the Government, including the first ethnic Somali ever appointed to ministerial rank in Kenya. Twenty tribes are represented among the 43 assistant ministers in the Government. The largest tribe, the Kikuyu (21 per cent of Kenya's 19.4 million), however, now claims that it is underrepresented in the political process.

Only 1 female candidate was elected to Kenya's National Assembly in 1983, although several others contested, and President Moi appointed 2 women to Kenya's National Assembly in 1983 as nominated members (the Kenyan Constitution provides for 12 such presidential appointments). In addition, over 20 female candidates were elected to municipal office.

The range of permissible discussion of, and opposition to, government policies has been fairly broad within the National Assembly. However, discussion is increasingly focused on such subjects as rural development, as the Government reacts to limit parliamentary criticism of national policies. The formal detention in August 1982 of Koigi wa Wamwere, a sitting Member of Parliament who was openly and repeatedly critical of major government policies, exemplifies government sanction against critics. Wamwere was among the four prisoners released on December 12, 1984, who had been detained under the Preservation of Public Security Act.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government of Kenya is sensitive to criticism of human rights conditions. Various human rights organizations, including Amnesty International, have conducted extensive letter-writing campaigns to the Government with respect to Kenya's resort to the use of formal detention. Although the Government released five persons held under the Public Security Act in October 1983 and an additional four in 1984, Government officials have emphatically rejected the notion that foreign pressure had anything to do with their decision. President Moi has specifically and publicly criticized Amnesty International for "meddling" in Kenyan internal affairs.

Although there are several Kenyan organizations which address certain aspects of human rights issues, there is no group which focuses exclusively on human rights concerns in Kenya. Kenya has neither signed nor ratified the Organization of African Unity's human rights charter which was adopted at the Organization's July 1981 summit in Nairobi.

Freedom House rates Kenya "partly free."

KENYA

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Kenya has one of the most dynamic and successful economies in Africa with a highly developed private sector and, in most years, food self-sufficiency. The Kenyan Government has taken action to improve the country's health care, education, and standard of living, but recent economic difficulties, including an unprecedented drought, have retarded progress in these areas. Because of the food crisis, Kenya must import a record 1.5 million tons of grain before the end of 1985. Real per capita growth of gross national product ($391.50 in 1982) has been virtually stagnant over the last several years. Kenya's economic problems are exacerbated by an annual population growth rate of 4.2 percent--the highest in the world. The Government is stressing both the importance of the private sector and of increasing agricultural output. Yet its continued reliance on inefficient public corporations, which control major commodity prices and distribution, is an obstacle to achieving these goals.

About one-quarter of Kenya's regular wage earner labor force works in agriculture, the sector paying the lowest wages. Significantly, however, only 1 million people (out of the 7.4 million estimated to be in Kenya's workforce) are in the formal sector, i.e., the wage economy. Kenya's workforce in the year 2000 will number approximately 14.6 million, putting even greater strain on the country's society and economy. Approximately 85 percent of Kenya's 19.4 million people live in rural areas, and 10 percent of the urban population and 55 percent of the rural population were estimated in 1978 to live below the poverty level. Western and Nyanza Provinces contain the largest numbers of the rural destitute population.

Another looming economic and social problem concerns Kenya's 70,000-member Asian community which directly accounts for approximately one-fourth of Kenya's total economic output. African resentment of Asians, primarily because of their extensive business holdings, has intensified in direct proportion to Kenya's current economic decline. Kenya's Africanization campaign to encourage black African participation in commercial interests has resulted in some Asian emigration and disinvestment and has prompted concern within the community for the security of Asian ownership.

Women constitute an essential factor in Kenya's labor equation. They still provide about three-quarters of Kenya's farm labor while carrying out their traditional familial responsibilities. Because of an accelerating rural out-migration of males to the cities in search of difficult-to-find but higher paying jobs, female farm labor is likely to maintain its prominent position. Several of Kenya's tribes still practice female circumcision. The Kenyan Government, however, has made a major effort to eliminate the practice. President Moi has publicly and repeatedly condemned female circumcision, and the Ministry of Health has forbidden such operations to be performed in government facilities.

Primary and secondary education are strongly encouraged in Kenya. The primary school enrollment ratio is 129.9 percent (1980), but secondary school enrollment rates drop sharply: of all students between ages 15 and 19, only 25 percent of males and 15 percent of females are enrolled in secondary school. About 2 percent of Kenya's college age population is enrolled in institutions of higher education, and of these students only 25 percent are female.

The considerable progress which Kenya made in health care in the early independence period has slowed in recent years. Life expectancy has risen steadily, however, from 42.5 years in 1960 to 57.7 in 1984. Concurrently, the infant mortality rate has steadily declined: in 1960 the rate was 150 per 1,000, a figure which dropped to 83 by 1977 and now stands at 60.9.

Although the most recent data available (1975) indicate that virtually all city dwellers have access to clean water, only four percent of Kenya's rural population has regular access to safe water. Last available data (1977) on caloric consumption indicate that 93.4 percent of Kenya's minimal nutritional requirements are met. The current drought in all probability will reduce that percentage.

Lesotho is nominally a constitutional monarchy but, in fact, almost all political power is held by Prime Minister Leabua Jonathan and his ruling Basotho National Party. In 1970, Jonathan suspended the Constitution, which provided for parliamentary democracy, and declared the results of that year's elections null and void. Seats in the present National Assembly are all appointed, with a heavy majority going to Basotho National Party members, who also currently hold all cabinet portfolios. The Government asserts that traditional democratic practices are preserved through the holding of mass public meetings known as "pitsos," but dissent is rarely aired at these government-orchestrated gatherings. The Government also emphasizes respect for the chieftancy system, hierarchically extending from village chiefs to district chiefs to the king, although this system plays a marginal role in the national decision making process. The main function of the "pitsos" and the chieftancy system is to elicit public support for decisions already made by Jonathan's Government.

A sporadic armed insurgency waged since 1978 by supporters of Basotholand Congress Party leader Ntsu Makhehle abated in 1984, with only one attack reported. The insurgents, known as the Lesotho Liberation Army, have in the past been held responsible for attacks on government and/or ruling party installations and personnel including cabinet ministers. The Government does not believe, however, that the insurgents have permanently abandoned their campaign of violence and continues to cite the threat of renewed attacks as justification for the strengthening of security laws.

The Human Rights Act of 1983, technically guaranteeing many fundamental human rights, came into force in July 1984. However, this Act is "subject to the provisions of existing law," which includes temporary detention without trial and other restrictions on human rights. The Parliament passed a new internal security bill in 1984, which codifies existing security laws, removes bail in cases of armed robbery, increases sentences for certain security offenses, and allows for the detention of witnesses in security cases. While the courts have not hesitated to rule against the Government in security cases, potential for mistreatment of prisoners prior to trial remains high, as it is also for those detained for purely criminal offenses.

Lesotho is a developing country which has a free market economy based primarily on subsistence agriculture. The economy is highly dependent on remittances by Lesotho citizens engaged in migrant labor in South Africa, amounting to 40 percent of Lesotho's gross national product. The Government is likewise dependent on revenue generated by the South African Customs Union, which accounts for 70 percent of government revenue. The economic situation worsened in 1984 primarily due to a major drought which plagued most of southern Africa.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Although acts of violence attributed to the Lesotho Liberation Army decreased markedly in 1984, a small number of deaths undoubtedly occurred. One person died while apparently constructing bombs.

Individuals with political opposition and/or suspected insurgent ties have been attacked by persons alleged to be members of the police, the army, or local police volunteer units. One prominent opposition supporter was shot at by unknown assailants outside his house in July 1984. Two separate armed attacks in late 1984 on shops owned by two brothers identified with the opposition resulted in the death of one of the men and his son and the wounding of the other. One of the dead men had been acquitted on treason charges earlier in the year. A magistrate's inquest into the 1983 death of Henry Masheane, who allegedly hung himself while in security detention in 1983, was completed with the finding that Masheane had been killed while in detention, although no one was held responsible.

b. Disappearance

No disappearances were reported in 1984.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Beatings by police and military personnel continue to be reported, although they are difficult to document. Such abuse generally takes place during the arrest and interrogation phases, and it is apparently not limited to cases related to national security but extends to common criminals as well.

Conditions in places of detention are extremely poor. Given the constraints on government spending, any improvement in detention facilities appears unlikely. Prisoners who can afford lawyers (and are thus more likely to file lawsuits charging abuses) usually receive better treatment.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Habeas corpus applies to ordinary arrests and few prisoners are held outside legal norms. Habeas corpus does not apply to those detained under the Internal Security (General) Act of 1982. This act provides for preventive detention under an interim custody order of an initial period of 14 days, after which a detention order must be issued or the individual released. The detention order is valid for 14 days and may be extended an additional 14 days, after which the detainee must be charged or released. If released, the individual may be redetained only for a different cause.

The initial 14-day detention may be effected by any policeman; the second period of 14 days can be ordered only by the Commissioner of Police. The third period must be ordered by a Minister. During the initial 14 days, access to the detainee requires police permission; during the second stage, ministerially appointed "advisers" are permitted access. Advisers so far appointed have been district coordinators, magistrates, or government medical officers, all employees of the State. The function of the "advisers" is to report on the health of the detainee, to investigate whether a detainee has been involved in subversive activities, and to advise the Minister on the need for the continued detention. Since they do not have access to attorneys, individuals under preventive detention may make representations on their treatment only through the "advisers." The Internal Security (General) Bill of 1984 revokes bail in cases of armed robbery and allows for detention of witnesses in security cases.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The judiciary in Lesotho is independent and has acted to limit police or military infringements of law and procedure on a number of occasions. Court decisions and rulings are respected and obeyed by the authorities. Civil suits alleging maltreatment are accepted and adjudicated. Verdicts of civil courts may be appealed to the high court. In military cases, decisions may be appealed to officers of higher rank, including to the Lesotho Paramilitary Force Commander, but not to civilian courts. Under the system of Roman-Dutch law applied in Lesotho, there is no trial by jury.

Eleven men allegedly associated with the Lesotho Liberation Army were tried on charges of high treason before the High Court in early 1984. The defendants were accused of involvement in a series of sabotage incidents. The Chief Justice, who presided, dismissed the case for lack of evidence without the defense having to present its case. A number of witnesses for the prosecution failed to appear, while others testified that their evidence was obtained under duress. The case of the lone female defendant was dismissed before going to trial.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

These rights are generally respected in Lesotho, although under the Internal Security Act of 1982 the police are given wide powers to stop and search, and to enter homes or other places for a similar purpose without warrant. Forced entry of the home has in the past been credibly alleged but is quite possibly the result of indiscipline rather than deliberate policy. The leader of one small opposition party reported that his home and offices were searched by the police, who confiscated some of his records and a tape of an interview he had made with South African radio.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Internal Security Act of 1982 does not contain safeguards of free speech. In practice, opposition viewpoints are freely expressed only in two Sesotho-language weekly newspapers published by the Roman Catholic and Evangelical Churches. In 1984, criticism centered on the lack of elections, the Government's format for proposed elections, Lesotho's recognition of the People's Republic of China, and the establishment of diplomatic relations with several eastern bloc countries, including the Soviet Union. This criticism has been tolerated but has been rebutted and attacked by government-owned Radio Lesotho (the only radio station in Lesotho) and in the government-published Lesotho Weekly. The Government has also strongly criticized articles and viewpoints in the South African media, which are widely read and listened to in Lesotho.

As talk of elections increased in 1984, Radio Lesotho sharply stepped up its attacks on opposition parties and politicians, depicting them variously as irrelevant splinter groups with no support, opportunistic political has-beens, or agents of South Africa. One dissident member of the ruling party apparently applied for air time but was turned down. With the government-controlled radio serving as the voice for the ruling party, opposition viewpoints have as their only outlets the two church weeklies, or the South African media.

Thabo Lesehe, the Assistant Editor of the Lesotho Evangelical Church paper, was detained for several weeks in early 1984 and subsequently released without charge. The Roman Catholic newspaper was censured by the Parliamentary Privileges Committee for allegedly misrepresenting remarks made in a speech by the Minister of Justice and Prisons, although the Committee seems to have no legal standing to enforce such a condemnation.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Permits are required for public and private meetings. Groups wishing to hold political rallies or organized sessions sometimes encounter harassment, generally in the form of denial or delays of permit applications, or of investigatory arrests of persons attending. Members of the police can generally be expected to attend such meetings. Despite these restrictions, numerous rallies were held in 1984 by the opposition parties.

Although freedom of association is generally respected in the trade union sphere, the Government intervened to encourage the formation of a single trade union confederation after negotiations for the merger of the two existing confederations broke down. The Government declared the registrations of both confederations null and void, and as a result most of the member unions of the two met and approved the formation of a new combined confederation, the Lesotho Congress of Free Trade Unions (LCFTU). Some trade unions associated with the former Lesotho Federation of Trade Unions have criticized the new confederation, alleging that some union leaders who joined the new confederation did so without the approval of their membership.

All trade unions in Lesotho enjoy the right to organize, bargain collectively, and strike. However, trade unionism has played a relatively minor role in the society, largely because of the small size of the modern manufacturing, retail, and service sectors.

Union, government, and employer representatives have participated in delegations to the International Labor Organization and other foreign and international trade union organizations, and there are a number of programs and projects sponsored by these groups designed to strengthen trade unionism in Lesotho. The LCFTU is a member of the democratic-oriented, Brussels-based International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, as well as of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity.

c. Freedom of Religion

These is no state religion in Lesotho. Free and open religious practice is permitted. Christianity is the dominant faith, with the principal denomination being Roman Catholicism. There is a significant Protestant minority composed of the Lesotho Evangelical Chruch (Presbyterian), Anglican Church, and a wide variety of other denominations. Conversion is permitted, and there is no indication that members of a given religion are persecuted or discriminated against on that basis or gain any advantage over another.

Although some of the Government's principal opponents have belonged to the Lesotho Evangelical Church, many government officials are likewise active in that faith. A number of churches are engaged in a dialogue with the Government and exiled opposition political leaders with the aim of promoting "national reconciliation" with exiled opponents of the regime.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Movement within the country is free, although temporary police and military roadblocks are sometimes set up to counter insurgent activity. There is no legal restraint on emigration, but overseas travel is made more difficult by a sizable repatriation deposit required of passport applicants. Large numbers of Lesotho citizens perform migrant labor, taking advantage of employment available in the mining and other sectors of the South African economy. Several thousand political refugees and economic migrants from South Africa reside in Lesotho. They are generally free to move about the country, although the Government imposes restrictions on the political activities of refugees as a condition of their entry. Government policy is to integrate South African refugees, insofar as possible, into the mainstream of Lesotho society. A small number of South African refugees left Lesotho for other neighboring countries in late 1983, reportedly to avoid possible reprisal from South Africa. Although Lesotho is a signatory of the U.N. Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees, refugees who leave Lesotho on U.N. travel documents issued by Lesotho are sometimes not granted the right to return.

While a number of political exiles from Lesotho are resident in neighboring countries, notably Botswana and South Africa, repatriation is not discouraged. The 1980 Amnesty Act allows political exiles to return after signing statements concerning any criminal acts they may have committed, but few have done so. Internal opposition leaders have called for the Government to assure the safe return of political exiles in conjunction with any future elections. Prime Minister Jonathan has publicly stated that he would favorably consider an amnesty application, if made, by Ntsu Mokhehle, the exiled leader of the Lesotho Liberation Army.

Prime Minister Jonathan and the leadership of his Basotho National Party have ruled Lesotho since they were freely elected by a narrow margin in 1965, manipulating the system to remain in power. In 1970, when the results of the first (and so far only) post-independence elections appeared to be going against him, Jonathan declared a state of emergency, suspended the constitution, and voided the election results. Subsequently, an "interim" Parliament was appointed, with the vast majority of seats going to the Basotho National Party and a handful to the Basutoland Congress Party and the Marematlou Freedom Party.

Contrary to the Government's promise, the 1984 session of the interim Parliament adjourned without a date being set for elections. The interim Parliament did pass three electoral amendment acts which, inter alia, call for staggered voting, a significantly larger deposit for each parliamentary candidate, and more voter signatures on a petition required for each candidate to be placed on the ballot. The opposition parties charged that these new measures could be used to intimidate voters and discourage opposition candidates from running.

The lack of elections has made it difficult to estimate the level of popular support accorded to any of the parties. Several opposition parties have announced their intention to contest elections when they are eventually held. The exiled leader of the military wing of the Basutoland Congress Party, Ntsu Mokhehle, has apparently rejected the elections proposed by the Government as unfair and refuses to take part. Other members of the Basutoland Congress Party who have eschewed violence operate openly in Lesotho, as do the other opposition parties, but the public activities of all are somewhat restricted by security legislation. The newly formed Basotho Democratic Alliance, which registered as a political party after several opposition politicians had discussions with the South African Foreign Minister, has been criticized by the Government because of its alleged South African ties. Two of its leaders who held seats were expelled from Parliament.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

In past years, representatives of Amnesty International who have visited Lesotho to investigate human rights conditions have met with government officials and been provided access to some security detainees who complained of abusive treatment. In general, the Government has attributed alleged human rights violations to an excess of zeal or indiscipline by low-level police or military officials, not sanctioned by government policy, and pointed to the judicial remedies available in the courts. In its 1984 report, Amnesty International was concerned about the use of detention without trial and the failure to investigate allegations of torture of detainees. Members of Amnesty International reportedly wrote to Lesotho government officials in 1984 concerning the status of several security detainees, but it is not known what reply they may have received. Freedom House rates Lesotho "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Lesotho is one of the countries designated by the United Nations as "least developed," with a per capita gross national product of $512 in 1982. Over 40 percent of this amount was made up from remittances from immigrant workers in the Republic of South Africa. About 90 percent of the country's imports and tourist traffic comes from South Africa. In addition, Lesotho is tied to South Africa through a customs union and an interchangeable currency. Customs union receipts in recent years have averaged about 70 percent of total government revenues. These funds, coupled with donor support programs, have managed to prop up a shaky and apparently unstable fiscal program, at the price of South African domination of Lesotho's agricultural sector. In addition, the potential of well-paying jobs, by Lesotho standards, has attracted the cream of the labor force to South Africa at the expense of local development. Only about 10 percent of the indigenous Lesotho labor force is employed outside traditional agriculture.

Lesotho's economic plight is further complicated by its general lack of natural resources, its mountainous terrain, and its generally low rainfall. Development of water resources, including potential hydropower, appears the best long-range hope for economic development.

The 1984 population was estimated to be 1,474,000, with an annual growth rate of 2.5 percent. Life expectancy was estimated to be 53.77 years in 1984. The infant mortality rate was 99.4 per 1,000 live births in 1984, down from 104.3.

Nutritional standards are adequate, with the ratio of calorie supply available for consumption to nutritional requirements estimated in 1977 to be 98.46 percent. However, a reduction in food supplies due to the current drought has hit some areas hard, with reports of serious malnutrition among children in certain villages. In 1975, only 17 percent of the population was estimated to have access to safe water. Major efforts by both the Government and donors since then have greatly increased this percentage, although exact figures are not available.

Lesotho has a long history of church-sponsored primary schools located throughout the country, which have contributed to a comparatively high adult literacy rate. School enrollment in 1979 was 118.34 percent overall--96.2 percent for boys and 140.8 percent for girls. (Refugees from South Africa account for this increased ratio beyond 100 percent.) Although a basic church-sponsored education system is in place, both the Government and the churches lack the funds to standardize training, improve standards, and replace and develop needed facilities. Generally, the education provided is highly academic and provides little or no vocational training.

All Basotho have fairly equal opportunity within the confines imposed by political reality, although in the areas of property and contracts married women's rights, independent of their husbands, are limited by custom and law. For example, married women cannot apply for loans without their husband's written consent. Women in Basotho society have traditionally been a stabilizing force, due to the absence of hundreds of thousands of men working in South Africa. Fuller use of their talents and abilities will depend on the progress Lesotho makes in providing education, health, and other social services to the rural areas where the overwhelming majority of those women live.

LIBERIA

Liberia has been ruled by a military government since a 1980 coup ended 133 years of constitutionally elected government. The previous Government was an oligarchy of freed slaves who had come to Liberia seeking freedom denied them in the United States and the West Indies. This group and their descendants, called "Americo-Liberians," largely excluded from political and economic power the 95 percent of Liberia's population which came from indigenous ethnic groups. Master Sergeant Samuel Kanyon Doe and 16 fellow coup-makers, all young non-commissioned officers from indigenous backgrounds, justified taking power as a revolt against elite rule. Doe and his colleagues established a military government called the People's Redemption Council (PRC), suspended the Constitution, instituted martial law, and placed a ban on political activities. Thus, for the present, Liberia has a military government with few institutional checks on the power of the Head of State and the executive branch, although the judiciary can and does act independently, as recently occurred in two major cases.

In December 1980, Head of State Doe pledged to return Liberia to civilian rule in 1985. Since that time, he has repeatedly and publicly reaffirmed his commitment to the transition to democratically elected, constitutional, civilian rule, now announced for January 1986. In preparation, a new Constitution was drafted by a National Constitution Commission, and approved in a referendum in July 1984. This was followed by the dissolution of the PRC and the establishment of an Interim National Assembly, comprised of all former PRC members and 36 appointed civilian members, with Head of State Doe serving as its President. Next, on July 26, 1984, the ban on political activities was lifted, except in educational institutions, and within 3 months, 13 political parties had formed and announced their intention to contest the elections.

This steady progress has since slowed due to stiff registration requirements for political parties, and the promulgation of Decree 88A, which has a chilling effect on political expression by blurring the limits of permissible criticism of the Government.

Also in 1984 there have been more frequent detentions of individuals without charge (four journalists, one lawyer, and several political figures); a seven-month closure of a leading independent newspaper; the public flogging without trial of two government officials accused of theft; and the violent dispersal on one occasion of protesting students and subsequent closure of the University of Liberia.

Liberia has a mixed economy with significant state enterprise activity in utilities, agriculture marketing, and transportation. Foreign exchange receipts and government revenues are heavily dependent on exports of iron ore, rubber, and timber, all of which have suffered prolonged market decline. Education, wealth, and commercial property are concentrated in a narrow elite while two-thirds of the population remain in subsistence agriculture. The Government has attempted to reduce income disparities by increasing employment in government, the country's largest single employer, and raising minimum wages for civil servants and the military. Economic constraints, mismanagement, and corruption have hindered broader access to education, health services, and participation in the modern sector. Corruption persists despite periodic trials of government officials for theft and corruption. Literacy is estimated at 25 percent and unemployment at 18 percent, although the latter may approach 50 percent in certain areas, such as Monrovia.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no confirmed reports of political killings in Liberia in 1984.

b. Disappearance

In 1984 there were no permanent disappearances of persons resulting from actions of government, quasi-government, or opposition elements, although arbitrary arrests and detentions, mostly short term, have continued. Four persons were reported missing after troops were used to put down demonstrations on the University of Liberia campus in Monrovia; one has been found and the investigation continues in the other three cases.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Suspects in criminal offenses may be subjected to beating or lashing by security personnel as a summary form of "justice" upon or shortly after apprehension. However, it is not in most cases repetitive nor used as a tool in interrogation. Prisoners are also often stripped to their underwear in an effort at humiliation and to impede their escape. These practices run counter to Liberian judicial principles and are not condoned by the Government, although they have proved difficult to curb. However, some criminal statutes authorize sentences including periodic administration of a specified number of lashes. In October 1984, the Minister of Finance ordered the public flogging without trial of two government officials accused of theft.

Custom and government regulations permit "trial by ordeal" in some civil and criminal cases although senior government officials have spoken out against the practice. While the suspect's consent is formally required, social pressure may play a coercive role. The ordeal usually consists of drinking a liquid prepared from the bark of the "sassywood" tree. Vomiting the liquid after ingestion indicates innocence, while its retention signifies guilt. However, even if vomited, the potion may be toxic. There have been no reports of "sassywood" related deaths in 1984.

Most prisons lack proper nutritional, exercise, and sanitary facilities. However, the Palace of Correction in Zwedru, Grand Gedeh County, is reported to be clean, modern, and spacious.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Since the 1980 coup, martial law has coexisted with civilian law enforcement and judicial machinery. While the Constitution and the right of habeas corpus have been suspended, the full body of pre-coup statute and case law is regarded more or less as valid. Civilians charged with statute violations are arrested by police under warrant and must be charged within three days of the arrest. Suspects have the right of bail in non-capital offenses, are entitled to legal counsel, and may only be convicted in a court of law under the due process procedures. Security officers charged under council decrees, and in some cases civilians, may be arrested by armed forces personnel, and brought before the Special Military Tribunal. The Tribunal is a panel of three uniformed officers which operates using the standards of the Uniform Code of Military Justice of the U.S. military.

Reports of abuses by police and soldiers are frequent, although declining in response to disciplinary efforts. Reports of harassment are common. Civilians have reportedly been arrested or threatened with arrest by soldiers and police who then required payment of a "fine." In other cases, members of the former PRC arrogated to themselves informal authority to arrest, detain, and try persons involved in civil and labor disputes. Fines and short prison sentences were sometimes imposed without reference to due process or to relevant statutes and decrees. The Government condemns these practices and regularly makes statements calling for their eradication.

In late August and early September, several leaders of one of the political parties were arrested and accused of plotting a coup. The Liberian Council of Churches, the entire administration of the University of Liberia, and the majority of the political parties petitioned the Head of State for their release. Western diplomats also expressed their concern that the accused be given a speedy and fair trial. Seven weeks after the arrests, the detainees were released without formal charges having been brought against them.

In a violent incident on August 22, soldiers entered the campus of the University of Liberia by order of the Head of State to disperse several thousand students who were protesting the detention of a prominent Liberian educator and political leader. The Government has stated that 102 injuries resulted, 5 from gunshots, and acknowledged that some people were made to strip, were beaten and whipped, and even raped. The incident has not yet been thoroughly and independently investigated, but the Government has denied claims by various groups that people were killed.

During 1984, the Government also detained four journalists and a lawyer without charges after they made statements critical of the Government. All were released after two to five months in prison. In December, five individuals were arrested and accused of publishing a series of leaflets critical of the Government; however, they have not been formally charged. One party official is currently under arrest for criticizing government action with regard to the arrest of a prominent Liberian educator and political leader.

Detainees are not usually held incommunicado, though occasionally a detainee will be denied visitors for several days. In some instances bribes are demanded by guards before family members are permitted to visit those jailed.

LIBERIA

The Liberian Government does not exile its citizens. In fact, the Head of State and other government officials have on many occasions urged Liberians who fled or stayed abroad after the coup to return home. The Government specifically excluded from its amnesty two former regime figures who remained abroad: former Vice President Bennie Warner, and former True Whig Party Secretary Clarence Simpson. However, on July 26, the Head of State granted amnesty to Bennie Warner. Those Liberians who did return have not been persecuted by the Government.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Liberia's civilian court system is based on Anglo-American jurisprudence, and the military courts follow the Uniform Code of Military Justice of the U.S. military. While there are many good judges and lawyers, there have been numerous allegations of corruption among lawyers and judges and of interference in court cases by senior government officials.

For three months in 1984, the Special Military Tribunal tried the case of 19 defendants, some of whom were civilians, charged in November 1983 with conspiring to overthrow the Government. The trial was closed to the public and only representatives of the government-owned media were present. There were allegations that the trial was manipulated by the Government. Thirteen of the defendants were found guilty and sentenced to death. However, two days later the Head of State gave clemency to 10 of the 13. Ultimately, three men found guilty of murder during a raid connected with the alleged coup were executed.

Historically, the judiciary in Liberia has been very weak and vulnerable to influence exerted by the executive branch. However, in 1984, the courts showed considerable independence and integrity in two major cases of interest to the Government. On June 21, the Special Theft Court, a panel of three judges whose decisions are not subject to appeal, acquitted former Director of the National Housing and Savings Bank Hilary Dennis of embezzlement charges, on the grounds that the prosecution "was negligent and failed to present a prima facie case." The strongly worded decision was especially important because it had been alleged that the Special Theft Court was vulnerable to government pressure.

The same court, however, has also accepted jurisdiction in disputes in which its jurisdiction is open to question. It recently ordered the arrest of heads of private companies in two instances of disputes with employees or clients on compensation and insurance claims. It has been argued that such disputes belong in appropriate civil courts, whose judgments are subject to appeal. Both cases were dismissed, but only after considerable delay.

Another important trial was the case of the Daily Observer, a leading independent newspaper closed by the Government in January for printing articles critical of the Government. The case was heard by one of the Supreme Court justices, who ruled in April that the Government had no case. The paper resumed publication in August 1984.

The Head of State's statement in late 1984 that a prominent Liberian educator and politician (who had been detained for subversion and was subsequently released without being charged) should be considered guilty until proven innocent, and Doe's reversal in December of a unanimous Supreme Court decision, have raised fears within the judiciary and the public at large over the independence of the judiciary.

Traditional courts presided over by tribal chiefs are not bound by Anglo-American common law or judicial principles but apply customary unwritten law to domestic and land disputes and petty theft. Customary court decisions may be reviewed in the statutory court system, or may be appealed through a hierarchy of chiefs, followed by administrative review by the Internal Affairs Ministry, and in some instances a final review by the Head of State. Allegations of corruption and incompetence involving the traditional courts are often heard.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Under the martial law regime currently in effect, security forces may enter private residences without warrants, although civilian courts continue to issue warrants in the majority of cases. There were several cases reported in 1984 of persons arrested in their homes without warrants. In none of these cases, however, was the residence reportedly entered forcibly.

In enforcing the ban on political activities, Liberian security services monitored the activities of groups or individuals believed to harbor political ambitions, and have continued to do so after the ban on politics was lifted. Surveillance is not widespread or generalized, however.

There have been some instances reported of mail-opening by government forces. There is no express prohibition on receiving foreign publications, but occasionally the Government attempts to ban a particular issue of a foreign periodical that it considers especially critical.

The Government has returned most of the real and personal property confiscated after the coup. In April 1984, Head of State Doe ordered the immediate return of any confiscated properties not previously returned to their owners.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Government has dealt inconsistently with the issue of freedom of speech and press. Government officials have made statements affirming support for free speech. At the same time, however, the Government has passed laws restricting free speech and press.

In 1980, Council Decree 2-A was passed outlawing efforts to "control, influence, oppose, castigate or deride (government) actions on policies." The law mandates death by firing squad for offenders. Only two prosecutions have been brought under Decree 2-A, both prior to 1983, and in both the convicted defendants were pardoned by the Head of State.

But in 1984, the Government increased its restrictions on freedom of speech and press. In August, the Government announced Decree 88A which makes it a felony to accuse any government official or other individual of any crime if the purpose of the accuser is to injure the person's reputation, to create disharmony, to spread rumors, to undermine the security of the state, or impede the electoral process. Three members of an opposition political party have been charged with violations of Decree 88A; however, only one is imprisoned (he was held for six weeks before charges were brought), as the authorities have been unable to locate the other two. In December, five individuals were arrested and accused of publishing a series of leaflets critical of the Government. The detainees may be charged with a violation of Decree 88A, but they have not yet been formally charged with any crime. The two major independent newspapers, several political parties, and the Liberian Council of Churches have publicly stated that Decree 88A is an unwarranted restriction on freedom of speech and press.

In addition to statutory limitations, the Government has taken other steps which have had the effect of restricting freedom of speech and press. Besides the politician who continues to be detained and has been charged with a violation of Decree 88A, four journalists, one lawyer, and one other politician were detained without charges after making statements critical of the Government. All were released after two- to five-month prison terms, and no charges were ever brought. The politician was publicly accused of having plotted to overthrow the Government but was never formally charged. He was released after seven weeks.

In January, the Government closed the Daily Observer, a leading independent newspaper, and began legal proceedings to revoke its license to publish. This was the fifth time since the 1980 coup that the Government has closed this newspaper. In April, a Supreme Court judge ruled that the Government had no case; the Justice Ministry appealed the verdict, but in July the Head of State ordered that the paper be allowed to reopen.

The result of the government actions to restrict free speech and press has been to introduce an unspecified degree of self-censorship to avoid confrontation. The independent press usually avoids direct criticism of government policies. In analyzing public issues, finding fault with the status quo and suggesting remedies, however, editorials regularly express criticism indirectly. In some instances, the Government has forbidden reports on specific events, such as labor unrest or school disturbances, whose disclosure could prove embarrassing to it. There is no organized censorship of independent news organs. The government-owned Liberian News Agency keeps high standards of accuracy, although it omits reports on some developments at the direction of the Information Ministry.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The ban on political parties was lifted in 1984 and parties have been allowed to hold organizing meetings. However, shortly after the lifting of the ban, the Special Elections Commission announced that parties wishing to register to compete in the elections would have to deposit $50,000 in cash and a $100,000 bond in an escrow account until they satisfied all requirements for registration, including the signatures of 500 registered voters from at least 6 of the 11 counties. This has created a significant obstacle to the registration of opposition parties.

LIBERIA

There are no official restrictions on civic, religious, social, recreational, or self-help development associations. Union organizing, collective bargaining, and the internal operations of trade unions are largely free from government interference. The Government has in fact allowed union organizing on plantations, forbidden under previous administrations. A national trade union confederation, the Liberian Federation of Labor Unions (LFLU), and several individual independent unions exist. The LFLU is a member of the Brussels-based, democratic-oriented, International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, as well as of the continent-wide, Ghana-based Organization of African Trade Union Unity.

Unions are prohibited from strike action but brief strikes have occurred despite the ban. In most cases, workers have been persuaded to return peacefully to their jobs and the Government has taken no punitive action. In considering the case of an agricultural union suspended in 1982 the International Labor Organization noted that the prohibition against strikes "constitutes in itself a serious violation of trade union rights." The suspension, based on allegations of embezzlement against the union's secretary general, came shortly after illegal strikes which he had allegedly instigated. The suspension was lifted in October 1984 shortly after embezzlement charges were brought against the secretary general and two other officials. In 1983 and again in 1984, the Liberian Government was cited by the ILO for violations of ILO Convention 87, regarding freedom of association (because Liberian legislation does not recognize the right of workers in the public service or in government enterprises to form unions), and Convention 29, regarding forced labor. The Liberian Government has drafted a new labor code, which eliminates the objectionable legislation cited by the ILO, but it has not yet promulgated its new labor code, and thus the legislation for which it was cited by the ILO still remains on the books.

Under the new Constitution and the election laws, unions and business are both prohibited from forming political parties or canvassing for or contributing to political parties. Parties are also prohibited from canvassing for members until they have met the $150,000 pre-registration requirement.

c. Freedom of Religion

The pre-coup Constitution called for separation of church and state, a concept repeated in the new Constitution for the future civilian government. Christianity, brought by 19th century settlers and spread through the interior by missionaries, has long been the religion of the elite groups. But it has not been an official or state-favored religion. The majority of the rural population continues to practice traditional religions, and approximately 15 percent of the total population is Muslim. Many government officials are Muslims, and Muslims are active throughout the economy, especially in transportation and gold and diamond trading. In late 1983, the Government solicited suggestions for a date of particular significance to Muslims to be declared an annual national holiday.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Neither domestic movement nor foreign travel is restricted. Some travelers have reported harassment and requests for payoffs from security personnel manning internal checkpoints and border crossings or, in rare cases, by government agencies trying to pressure travelers. Exit visas are required for departure and obtaining them may be made more difficult by bribe-seeking officials. Emigration and immigration are not formally restricted. Some naturalized Liberian citizens originally from other African states have had their citizenship revoked on apparently arbitrary grounds.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Liberia's military Government has made substantial progress in instituting a formal mechanism to allow the people to participate in the political process of transition to democratically chosen, constitutional civilian government. The commitment to return Liberia to civilian rule was first made publicly in December 1980 by the Head of State. Since that time it has been repeated many times by the Head of State and other officials, and the legitimacy of the military Government has been linked to that pledge.

The new Constitution, drafted by the National Constitution Commission and reviewed by the Constitutional Advisory Assembly, was approved by the Government. The Special Elections Commission conducted a successful voters' registration, and the voters then approved the Constitution in a referendum which was hailed by many observers as an important milestone in Liberia's history. The new Constitution is scheduled to become effective with the installation of a civilian government in 1986. The ban on politics was lifted in July 1984, and 13 political parties began organizing themselves to participate in the 1985 elections. Although there have been some recent difficulties and delays in the long transition process, e.g., Decree 88A, overall progress has been significant.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Generally, the Government poses few objections or obstacles to investigations of the human rights situation. However, the Government did not allow observers at the trial in early 1984 of 19 persons charged with conspiracy to overthrow the Government. Several times this year the Government has met expressions of concern or requests for information with the argument that they constitute unwarranted interference with Liberia's domestic affairs. Amnesty International stated in its 1984 report that it did not have sufficient information on the situation in Liberia to include an entry in its report. Freedom House terms Liberia "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The Liberian economy depends heavily on export of iron ore, rubber, and timber, whose production is dominated by foreign corporations. Expatriate communities, primarily Lebanese and Indian, also control an estimated 80 percent of retail and wholesale trade. However, foreigners are not permitted to own real property. Gross national product (GNP) per capita was estimated in 1982 at $492.60, but 50 percent of national income is held by only 5 percent of the population. The current per capita figure is probably significantly lower due to negative GNP growth each year since 1980.

Twenty-three percent of the population (1978) is below the absolute urban poverty level. Health care is poor, especially outside urban areas. Only 20 percent of the population has access to safe water (35 percent in urban areas and 6 percent in rural; 1974). Average calorie supply, however, is 104.81 percent of requirements (1977). Despite a relatively high infant mortality rate of 129.60 per 1,000 (1984) and a life expectancy at birth of only 52.14 years (1984), the population is growing by 3.3 percent per year (1984).

Education for this growing population is a major problem. Only 25.4 percent of adults are literate (42.2 percent of males and 9.3 percent of females; 1980). The primary school enrollment ratio was 80.15 percent (99.09 percent for males and 60.95 percent for females), but many students drop out (only 22 percent of school-age children will finish elementary school and the dropout rate is much higher among women than men). The problems of poor education are exacerbated by the fact that two thirds of the teachers are not professionally qualified and only 70 percent have finished high school.

Liberia was founded by private American "colonization societies," as a territory where blacks could enjoy political, economic, and social freedoms denied them in the United States. Eventually, 20,000 settlers came to Liberia and they and their descendents have remained heavily influenced by American cultural, economic, and political models. In urban areas and along the seacoast where settler dominance was strongest, a modern sector has evolved with a free enterprise economy, substantial political and economic equality for men and women, and Anglo-American judicial procedures based on English common law as transmitted and modified by the American experience. Here, land is plotted, deeded, and held in fee simple, and women can inherit equally. There is no formal discrimination in property ownership, educational opportunity, or participation in economic and political processes. Women in Liberia have held ministerial and ambassadorial positions and are represented in the professions and throughout the modern economy.

In rural areas, where 70 percent of Liberia's estimated 2,160,000 population lives, the inhabitants practice subsistence agriculture and follow a traditional culture in which men's and women's roles are more strictly defined. Here, most land is held communally among the related families of a clan, and women provide most of the labor in food production and distribution, both for household consumption and market sale. As opposed to statutory marriage, seen as a contract between individuals, customary marriage is an agreement between families. With payment of dowry under the customary marriage system, a woman is considered the property of her husband and family. Upon the husband's death, the marital contract continues with the family, which has certain obligations and responsibilities to the widow, or more commonly widows, if they remain with the family as wives to other relatives. In the traditional sector, women are not usually entitled to inherit from their husbands or to administer their estates. In addition, women are informally excluded in many indigenous ethnic groups from chieftancies or membership in the councils of elders that direct the affairs of the community. In practice, especially in newly urban areas, many women use both the customary and statutory legal systems.

MADAGASCAR

Madagascar is governed by a President and National Popular Assembly elected by direct universal suffrage, and a Supreme Revolutionary Council chosen by both the President and National Assembly. Elections are actively contested within the controlled political framework sanctioned by the Government. This framework permits political activity by the seven parties making up the National Front for the Defense of the Revolution. Although all these parties theoretically share a commitment to a "socialist" state, they have established positions ranging from a relatively moderate, pro-Western stance, to support for pro-Soviet interests. They also compete against each other in local, regional, and national elections.

President Didier Ratsiraka was reelected in 1982 to a second seven-year term. He has broad constitutional powers, and his position is further strengthened by the influential role played by his political party, Arema, which holds an overwhelming majority in the National Assembly and which has a broad base of popular support. Also contributing to the President's power are his close ties to the state security apparatus. In his last election, the President won by a 70-percent majority but lost the vote of some important regional and urban centers. The President's role has evolved in recent years toward one of a power broker among various competing interests. He must contend with opposition not only from other parties in the Front but also, behind the scenes, from elements within the Supreme Revolutionary Council and his own party.

The Supreme Revolutionary Council is an advisory group broadly representative of Madagascar's regional and social structure. The leaders of all seven parties sit on the Council. The Council approves basic policy guidelines, convenes and adjourns the National Assembly, and passes laws when the Assembly is not sitting. Its members have broad patronage power through their control of scholarships and influence on government assignments.

Madagascar's legislative branch, the National Popular Assembly, was last elected to a five-year term in 1983. Four parties won seats, with the President's party, Arema, claiming 117 of 137 deputies. Arema did lose some major districts, including two by-elections in districts whose original vote results were invalidated by the High Constitutional Court. In 1984 the new Assembly has carried on vigorous debate over government policy and critically questioned ministers on government programs.

The Malagasy Constitution adopted in 1975 has made "socialism" the state's political philosophy. This led to nationalization of a major portion of the economy, although the private sector still plays an important role. Currently, the country's economy is in serious straits, with declining production in all sectors, burgeoning foreign debt, and rising unemployment. The problem has been further exacerbated by weak markets for export commodities, an inability to finance imports necessary for industrial production, and by the Government's over-involvement in the marketing mechanisms, especially in the agricultural sector. The Government has made efforts at economic liberalization and reform in return for assistance from the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund.

MADAGASCAR

Fundamental liberties and individual rights are guaranteed by the Malagasy Constitution. However, several of these rights, including particularly civil rights such as freedom of the press and freedom of assembly, are restricted in practice.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Since independence there has been only one political assassination. During 1984 there have not been any reports of unnecessary force or of other actions by the security forces which resulted in loss of life.

b. Disappearance

During 1984, there were no reported cases of disappearance.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

In 1983, there were allegations of brutality being used by the state security forces in their interrogation of persons arrested. These allegations were addressed by a court during the trial of alleged coup-plotters. In 1984, there have been no major state security trials nor any reports of state security forces using brutal methods of interrogation. Prison conditions are reported to be poor. Overcrowding and inadequate sanitation, health care, and diet are all problems in the prisons, and reflect the generally difficult economic situation which prevails in the country. There is no evidence of systematic or widespread mistreatment of prisoners.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

There is no concept of habeas corpus in the Malagasy legal system. In a normal criminal case the accused must be charged within three days or must be released. However, persons suspected of activity against the state may be legally detained incommunicado for 15 days, subject to indefinite extension if considered necessary by the Government. Defendants are generally charged formally and clearly within the specified time frame and upon being charged are entitled to the assistance of counsel. Counsel is readily available and, if a defendant does not already have a court-appointed attorney or cannot afford one, court-appointed counsel will be provided. Arbitrary arrest or detention occurs, however, in those cases which involve an alleged threat to the state. In such cases, the authorities may not bother with legal formalities in making an arrest. Some defendants in cases involving alleged coup-plotting were detained without being brought to trial for periods ranging from one year and eight months to over five years. Extended periods of pre-trial detention are the exception, not the rule, and are usually limited to cases considered genuine threats to the Government.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Under the Malagasy Constitution and in practice, the country's judiciary is independent of the Government. During the 1983 election period, there were a number of judicial decisions against the Government, some of which involved charges of election fraud. The courts also acquitted several individuals charged with plotting a coup. Although other defendants were eventually found guilty, the trial was fairly conducted, the defendants were represented by counsel, and the proceedings were followed by the public and the media. Judicial procedures are open and impartial.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The state does not generally intervene in the non-political aspects of the lives of the people. The home is inviolable under Malagasy law, and intrusions into an individual's residence must be made under the authority of a warrant. Although government economic policies limit the choices open to an individual, the Malagasy may make their own decisions, without government coercion or interference, in such matters as changing jobs or residence, marriage, having children, or joining or declining to join political parties or social organizations.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The media in Madagascar are subject to government censorship. The Government provides guidelines on prohibited topics, but these are not always explicit nor are they rigorously enforced. When enforced, the newspapers generally leave blank those columns where the deleted material would have appeared. In general, the censorship policies are designed to forestall media criticism of the President and top government officials and their actions. In one instance in 1984, a newspaper reporting on a downtown riot was withheld from distribution. Government control is further strengthened by state ownership of the radio, television stations, and news publications. There are, however, independent, privately owned newspapers as well, which can criticize within the above-mentioned guidelines what they perceive as the failings of the Government. Critical examination of a range of policy issues such as economic management, transportation, and education can be found in the media. Although direct attacks on the President are not permitted, criticisms of presidential policies and decisions are published. Individual citizens are free to voice their dissatisfaction with the Government without fear of arrest or harassment by the authorities. Although distribution of uncensored publications is officially prohibited, no instance is known in which action has been taken against them.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The right of assembly and association is restricted in Madagascar. Permits are required to hold public meetings and can be denied by the Government if officials believe that the meeting poses a threat to the state or endangers national unity. Persons and groups belonging to one of the parties in the National Front are permitted to organize and assemble. Two of these parties held national conferences in the capital city in 1984 and in speeches and resolutions roundly criticized the Government. Nevertheless, since political activity by groups outside the National Front is prohibited, dissenting political opinion is limited. Although the right to organize labor unions is recognized, unions do not play a major role either politically or economically. The labor force of 4.5 million is mostly agrarian, and union labor accounts for less than 5 percent of the total. Unions are permitted to strike and conduct substantive wage negotiations, but because of the depressed economy strikes have been few, and the trade unions have been relatively quiescent. Most unions are affiliated with the National Front parties.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Government of Madagascar is secular and there is no official religion. There is no discrimination on the basis of religious affiliation, and individuals are free to follow the faith of their choice. Missionaries and clergy are generally permitted to operate freely, and the Government has so far made no effort to restrain Christian churches which have become more outspoken in their criticism of government policies. Over half of the population is either Catholic or Protestant, with the remainder following traditional Malagasy religious beliefs or other faiths.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Government has imposed no restrictions upon travel within the country. Official approval must be obtained for trips outside the country, but there has been only one known instance in the past in which approval was denied due to the individual's political views. Foreign travel is impeded by the difficulty in obtaining foreign currency, as the Malagasy franc is not convertible abroad, and the Government limits the amount of hard currency that can be obtained for foreign travel. There is no refugee population in Madagascar.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The electorate's choice is constrained by the nature of the political system, since the only political parties allowed to operate in Madagascar are those which are members of the National Front. However, there exists a range of ideological and policy views among the Front parties, and within this spectrum there are viewpoints represented that are at odds with the policies of the administration. Thus, the electoral process does give the voters a chance to choose among candidates expressing differing views in local and regional elections and in the National Assembly and presidential campaigns. The electoral process, although not completely free from irregularities, has been essentially straightforward in recent elections. The political system in Madagascar also reflects a considerable degree of regional balance. There are no special conditions of nationality or citizenship which exclude any elements in society from participating in the existing political process.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government has not cooperated with groups wishing to investigate alleged human rights violations. There are no official representatives of human rights organizations in Madagascar. In 1981, Amnesty International representatives were denied visas. When the President's opponent in the election campaign called for supervision of the elections by Amnesty International in 1982, the President rejected this proposal as being in derogation of national sovereignty.

In the absence of private human rights groups, the Christian churches in the country have taken the lead in advocating human rights. Although the Government is sensitive to criticism emanating from this quarter, it has not officially responded to questions or criticisms from the churches or any other groups.

Amnesty International reported that at least 20 prisoners of conscience or individuals whose cases were being investigated by Amnesty International were released during 1983, mostly as a result of court decisions. As of the end of 1983, Amnesty International knew of only one untried political detainee. Freedom House rates Madagascar "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Madagascar's economic situation, which had steadily deteriorated since 1978, seems to have stabilized; but the outlook for improvement in the immediate future is dim. The Government has actively undertaken many reforms in conjunction with World Bank and International Monetary Fund assistance and is working closely with Western nations who continue to provide development assistance.

The gross national product (GNP), which had fallen each year from 1972 to 1982, increased slightly in 1983 with per capita GNP at $330. The population of 9.5 million continues to grow at a rate of 2.8 percent annually. Unemployment is becoming an increasingly serious problem, exacerbated by the migration of the rural poor into urban areas.

The agricultural sector is the most important in the economy, accounting for almost 90 percent of employment and approximately 85 percent of export earnings. However, agricultural production has declined to the point where Madagascar has been forced to import rice, the staple of the Malagasy diet. Much of this decline is attributable to government marketing policies which subsidize consumer costs and control producer prices. Recent liberalizations in the marketing system have ameliorated this situation, and agricultural production has increased slightly in 1984.

Despite problems with agricultural production, individual levels of caloric intake are at 110 percent of requirements (1977 statistic). Nevertheless, malnutrition and dietary deficiencies are ongoing problems due to erratic distribution of fresh fruit, vegetables, dairy products, and meat. Further, only one-fourth of the population has access to safe drinking water (1975 statistic).

Health care delivery systems are plagued with shortages of medical personnel, inadequate facilities, and limited supplies of antibiotics and other medicines. Malaria remains a continuing problem, especially in coastal areas, and the population is quite vulnerable to outbreaks of disease following natural disasters such as flooding. Life expectancy at birth was 49 years in 1984, and the infant mortality rate was 101.1 per 1,000 in 1983.

MADAGASCAR

World Bank 1980 figures for the primary school enrollment ratio show 90 percent for females and 98 percent for males. Recent dramatic increases in enrollment have resulted in overburdened facilities, shortages of qualified teachers, and extremely high student-teacher ratios in the public school system. The situation is unlikely to improve in the near future, and few families can afford the private or parochial schools.

There is little overt discrimination against individuals on the basis of ethnic grouping or sex in Madagascar. Although there are numerous indigenous ethnic groups in Madagascar, the society is relatively homogenous due to a common language and a tendency for what were perhaps once disparate cultures to draw together in an island environment. There are still distinctions among these groups, but there is little discrimination by one group against another. Ethnic Indian, Chinese, and French communities have experienced some resentment from the Malagasy and occasionally have been the target of local government policies favoring Malagasy nationals.

Madagascar has what is essentially a matriarchal society, and a highly visible role for women has been a long-recognized and integral part of the country's sociological framework. There are no restrictions concerning activities in which women may engage. Women have a lengthy tradition of involvement in high-level political activity, and currently there are women members of the Cabinet, Supreme Revolutionary Council, and the National Assembly. Women are also very active and play major roles in the various political parties. Women have a prominent role in the business and economic life of the country, with many of them managing or owning business concerns or filling management positions in state industries. Education at all levels is open to women. However, women in rural areas and among the poor face a greater degree of hardship. In addition to the responsibilities associated with child rearing and household management, economic necessity forces these women to engage in farm labor or other similar activities. These conditions stem more from socioeconomic factors than from a discriminatory bias toward women in Malagasy society.

MALAWI

The Government of Malawi is a one-man autocracy in which Life President Dr. H. Kamuzu Banda has held virtually unchallenged power, based on a philosophy combining nationalism and traditionalism, since independence in 1964. The President has maintained nearly undisputed control over political life and government and heads the sole political party, the Malawi Congress Party. Opposition to the Government is banned, and challenges to the system are suppressed. Total loyalty, not merely passive acceptance of party and government policy, is demanded under penalty of suspicion, if not detention by the authorities. Civil liberties exist at the sufferance of the authorities and are highly circumscribed. Political activity is limited to participation in the sole legal party and to conforming with its views and practices.

Malawi inherited a parliamentary form of government from Great Britain. Elections are held every five years but all candidates must be members of the Malawi Congress Party and hold views consistent with the prevailing political philosophy of the President, whom the party proclaimed "Life President" in 1970. Constitutional amendments and laws passed by the 101-member parliament, in effect, reflect decisions already taken by the President.

Military, police, and party security organs form a pervasive network throughout the land, assure the security of government, and are largely responsible for the human rights violations which do occur.

Malawi pursues a basically market-oriented economic philosophy, with substantial government involvement in the form of interventions through government-controlled enterprises. Individuals are relatively free to operate private businesses, hold property, and travel. A limited resource base has resulted in a low level of economic development and consequent de facto restraints on economic opportunities for most citizens.

In June 1984, the President commuted the death sentences of Malawi dissident leader and former Minister of Justice Orton Chirwa and his wife to life imprisonment. The Chirwas had been convicted of treason in May 1983 and the mandatory death penalty was upheld on appeal in February 1984. Their son Fumbani, who had been taken into custody with his parents in December 1981, was released from detention in February 1984 and allowed to leave the country. These cases had commanded international attention and clemency appeals, including appeals from Amnesty International.

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There have been no allegations of politically-motivated killings within the country during 1984.

b. Disappearance

Surreptitious detentions by the police, acting at the behest of the party, are not unknown. Lasting from a few weeks to several months, such disappearances usually occur in the name of either national security or party discipline.

There are no known instances in which such detentions have led to death.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Beatings by the police at the time of detention or arrest, or during interrogation are not officially condoned, but do occur. Persons convicted of violations of the law are sentenced to prison terms of varying lengths or are executed for capital offenses by hanging. An unknown number of political prisoners is said to be under a loose form of detention such as house arrest. Less severe and dangerous offenders frequently are sent to prison farms. Prison terms with hard labor are the norm for common criminals, with political detainees normally receiving less harsh or degrading treatment. Prison conditions are generally poor. In 1983, there were credible reports that prisoners considered to be incorrigible criminals received inhumane treatment, such as severely reduced food rations, lack of medical care, absence of sanitary facilities, and extended periods of confinement in shackles. Such treatment has caused general deterioration of the prisoners' health and, it is believed, some deaths.

There exists in Malawi a form of unusual punishment called forfeiture. The Forfeiture Act permits the Government to revoke the property rights of those suspected of economic crimes without recourse to appeal. It is an executive fiat with no judicial review. When the Forfeiture Act is invoked, the individual loses all his worldly possessions, including business, financial holdings, and personal possessions. Invocation of the Act against an individual does not extend to the family.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

At any given time there may be numerous detainees held without charge who have been arrested arbitrarily for real or perceived offenses against the party or Government. A Malawi resident (including Africans and those of Asian extraction) may be picked up almost at the whim of the authorities, held for varying lengths of time, beaten, and released after several weeks or months. The usual cause for such treatment is suspected disloyalty to the President or expression of views which differ even slightly from the accepted norm. Rarely are those so detained charged officially and brought before either traditional or modern courts. A suspect, however, may be held without charge for a long period of time while authorities develop a case. It is impossible to estimate the number of arbitrary detentions and arrests made in Malawi in 1984.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Those charged with criminal offenses are tried in either the traditional or modern court system, depending on the nature of the charge. Those charged under the military codes of justice are tried in military courts. Lawyers usually are not permitted to assist the defendant in traditional court cases, but legal counsel is permitted in the modern court system. In the latter case, the defendant has the right of access to counsel before and during the judicial proceeding. Government and party exert little control over the trial system in cases tried before the High Court or magistrate courts; hence, the modern judiciary is almost totally independent of the executive branch, other than the fact that the President appoints the Chief Justice of the High Court who, in turn, appoints other modern court justices. These courts are open to the public, and defendants are charged publicly. Traditional court justices are appointed directly by the President. It is generally believed that there is little executive interference in traditional court cases dealing in matters of customary law, and there is no evidence of indirect executive pressure on traditional courts adjudicating cases of a political nature. Although the decision is that of the Director of Public Prosecution or the Attorney General, the recent trend indicates that political cases are likely to be tried before a traditional court. There is a right to appeal in both the modern and traditional court systems.

On May 6, 1983, a traditional court found former Minister of Justice and captured leader of the banned Malawi Freedom Movement, Orton Chirwa, and his wife Vera guilty of treason for conspiring to overthrow the Malawi Government. In February 1984, the National Traditional Court of Appeals upheld the verdicts, which carried mandatory death sentences. Subsequently, in June 1984, the President commuted the death sentences to life imprisonment. The Chirwa case has generated considerable attention in the United States and other countries, with many charging that the Chirwas had not received a fair trial.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

In private life, the average citizen or alien resident is not unduly affected by government authority. Malawi law calls for the issuance of individual warrants before entry of the home, but this is not always observed in practice. Police and paramilitary groups enter houses of suspects at will under special entry authority to conduct searches for people or incriminating evidence. Other violations of the home generally do not occur. Membership in the only political party is not mandatory but is expected of those who aspire to government/party positions or even professional success. Access to government services, and even to some non-government services, such as a local market, is frequently based upon party membership. There is both official and self-censorship. Correspondence is monitored (mail is opened and read) by the authorities and those violating prescribed norms are punished.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Criticism of the Government and its policies is not tolerated. This proscription extends even to the Parliament, where the expression of total loyalty to the President and his Government is both expected and enforced under threat of expulsion or worse. All media are under direct or indirect government control. The two newspapers and sole radio station disseminate news directly authorized by the government information agency and operate under informal self-censorship guidelines. Recently both media have exhibited increasing candor in coverage of international issues. In practice, the principal focus of government censorship is on material deemed critical of the Government. Freedom of inquiry into the natural and social sciences exists at the university level, and includes examination of political ideologies at radical variance with those of the Government, provided this does not extend to explicit criticism of the Government.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Individuals and organizations generally are free to meet and associate as long as the purpose is not to protest against government or party policy or practices. Professional, fraternal, and service organizations exist and are encouraged by the Government. No political meetings are permitted other than those of the party. Labor unions exist, but their activities are highly circumscribed and they are generally ineffective. Strikes are not legally prohibited but rarely occur, and when they do they are not publicized. Labor unions fall under the umbrella of the Malawi Trade Union Congress, which in turn is subject to direction by the Ministry of Labor. With government permission and supervision, the trade union organization associates with international organizations, and the Malawi Trades Union Congress is a member of both the Organization of African Trade Union Unity and of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. While the labor movement has yet to achieve major gains for its constituents, the principal explanation is economic rather than political: the economy of Malawi can sustain only a small number of wage earners, most of whom occupy positions as unskilled laborers on large estate farms.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is relative freedom of religion in Malawi (for all but Jehovah's Witnesses) as long as particular religious tenets do not preclude recognition of the temporal authority of the state. The Watch Tower Sect is banned; the Government considers the Sect's activities to be disruptive of "the prevailing calm, law, and order." There is no state or preferred religion, and conversion from one religion to another is permitted. There are no restrictions on religious observances and ceremonies which do not impinge on government authority. Religious groups may establish places of worship and train clergy. There is no licensing of religious groups, but their publications, like all others, are subject to government censorship. Religious groups are free to establish and maintain links with coreligionists in other countries, and religious travel may be undertaken. Similarly, missionaries from abroad are permitted to enter Malawi and proselytize. There is no tie between a particular religion and the Malawi Congress Party.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Few restrictions have been observed on movement within Malawi, but denial of passports to some on political grounds frequently extends to family members of persons in political disfavor and to those persons whom the Government suspects may prove embarrassing to it when traveling abroad. Legal provisions exist for restricting the movement of those convicted of political or criminal offenses. Formal emigration is neither restricted nor encouraged. With the exception of a small group of political dissidents, there is no outward flow of Malawian refugees from the country. Expatriates born in Malawi may return. Citizenship may be revoked but in practice this is not done. Malawi does not accord official refugee status, but has treated de facto refugees from neighboring countries generously, and has pursued a policy of persuading rather than coercing such refugees to return to their own lands. Asian residents and citizens are free to travel within the country, but must reside and work in one of three urban areas (Lilongwe, Zomba and Blantyre/Limbe). Within some of these urban centers, strict rules governing where Asians may own property result in limitations on where they may reside. Asian residents, whether Malawian citizens or not, have been compelled to transfer ownership of rural shops and trucking businesses to ethnic African Malawian citizens. Asians are free to expand into other areas of business, however, and industrial licenses for new Asian industries are routinely granted.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Malawi is ruled by one man, the Life President, through the apparatus of the sole political party and government, which are closely linked. Decisions are taken either directly by the President or those few closely associated with him. No opposition political parties or movements are permitted. One must be a party member to participate in the political life of the nation, to be a member of Parliament, or to be a civil servant. Nearly half of the population has at least nominal party membership, but active party membership is obligatory if one aspires to higher levels of leadership. This prescription does not apply to the military per se, but adherence to party policy and directives is expected of all. The party's pervasiveness and broad based structure provide for some choice among candidates for party, parliamentary, and other offices. For example, as was the case in the 1983 election, there are often three candidates for election to a parliamentary constituency, but all nominees are selected by the party and submitted to the President for vetting. Active campaigning is not permitted. The National Assembly (Parliament) consists of both elected and nominated members and is mainly concerned with ratifying government policy. Its powers are broadly based in law but highly circumscribed in practice.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government does not permit organizations such as the International Committee of the Red Cross and Amnesty International to conduct investigations. No non-governmental organizations devoted to the furtherance of human rights are permitted to exist. Expressions of interest in alleged human rights problems by outside groups or individuals are not welcomed and usually are ignored. Few in government are even willing to discuss the subject of human rights. In its 1984 Report Amnesty International continued to express concern about the use of detention without trial and the lack of effective safeguards against ill-treatment of political detainees. Freedom House considers Malawi "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Malawi is a small, densely-populated, landlocked country, whose principal assets are moderately fertile soils, good water resources, and a climate favorable to crop production. Possessing no significant mineral resources, Malawi has pursued a successful export-oriented agricultural growth strategy since independence. The estate sector produces tea, tobacco, and sugar for export, while smallholders cultivate maize and to a lesser extent, tobacco, cotton, and vegetables. In recent years the country has been self-sufficient in food production and has exported surplus maize to its neighbors.

Malawi's small manufacturing sector is devoted principally to the processing of agricultural products; in addition, there are a few small import-substitution projects. Over 90 percent of the workforce is still engaged in subsistence agriculture. Wage levels are low, reflecting the abundance of unskilled labor, and the Government's desire to limit the rural-urban income gap and hence the rate of internal migration.

Malawi achieved an impressive record of economic growth from independence in 1964 through 1979: real GDP grew at an average rate of 5.5 percent per annum over this period. Since the mid-seventies, however, the country has experienced mounting balance of payments problems and an interruption in economic growth, due to such factors as escalation in import prices of fuel and capital goods; cyclical swings in the prices of agricultural exports--tea, tobacco, and sugar; and interruptions and resulting higher costs of transport in traditional rail routes to the Indian Ocean. With assistance from the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank, the Government has embarked on an ambitious structural adjustment program, including currency devaluation and agricultural pricing reform, aimed at restoring economic growth and achieving a sustainable balance of payments position.

Despite the strides made since independence, Malawi remains one of the world's least developed countries. Per capita GNP in 1982 measured only $213, reflecting the absence of any appreciable mineral or manufacturing base in the economy. Primary school enrollment has climbed dramatically since independence, with the 1980 enrollment ratio of school-age children estimated at 83 percent (male 95 percent, female 70 percent), and the adult literacy rate is estimated to be 25 percent. Health indicators likewise testify to the limited resources available for this sector: life expectancy at birth is 45 years and the infant mortality rate is 129 per 1000 live births; about 29 percent of the rural population and 70 percent of the urban population have access to safe water supplies (1976). Calorie supply is about 95 percent of requirements (1977).

Malawi's current population of 6.8 million people is growing at an estimated annual rate of 3.3 percent. With nearly all of Malawi's arable land already under cultivation, substantial increases in yields will be necessary to feed the ever-growing population.

As mothers, women have enjoyed a high degree of access to the traditional health services and to extension programs geared toward improving women's homemaking abilities. Such programs, while beneficial, have failed to recognize the important role women play as agricultural producers in the rural sector (roughly 70 percent of all smallholder farming and over 50 percent of subsistence holdings are headed by women) and the potential role women can have in the modern sector. Although males still have a comparative advantage in terms of educational and employment opportunities, the Government has initiated sufficiently broad-scale programs to begin to rectify the discrimination which exists. A third of the positions in the public education system have been reserved for women.

Women are entitled to party membership and voting rights, and hold 13 of 101 elected seats in Parliament. No women hold ministerial-level appointments. Within Malawi's traditional and primarily matrilineal tribal leadership structures, there are several small ethnic groups wherein women possess fewer rights and privileges and where female circumcision occasionally is practiced.

Malawi enjoys a considerable degree of ethnolinguistic uniformity. Ethnic and regional differences exist but have not been a disruptive element within the society. The vast majority of the population speaks and/or understands Chichewa, which became the national language in 1968. However, English is the official language for government and business. Malawi's indigenous groups are sufficiently alike in culture and social organization to permit relatively easy interaction, including intermarriage, mixing in agricultural settlements, and mixed grouping for political purposes.

MALI

Following its independence from France in 1960, Mali was ruled in succession by a pro-Marxist regime and a military government. Since 1979, Mali's civilian political leaders, under President Moussa Traore, have reduced the direct role of the military in government and increased the role of the sole political party, the Democratic Union of the Malian People, in governing the country. Military officers currently hold about a quarter of the senior positions in the Cabinet and the party, four of seven governorships, and a portion of the lower level administrative posts, mostly in border areas. Most of the senior central government officials are technocrats or regional political leaders.

The President, in consultation with his Cabinet and the party's Central Committee, makes all of Mali's important decisions although the Government also includes an elected National Assembly, which has little power.

In addition to the military, the security apparatus includes the gendarmes, the presidential guard, the state security unit, and the police which exert considerable, but generally low-key influence. While civil rights are officially guaranteed in Mali, avenues of recourse tend to be more effective through personal rather than official channels.

Mali in 1984 was characterized by civil calm, despite a potentially sensitive situation during a currency changeover and continued lack of wage increases. The political and human rights situation did not change significantly over the past year. The Government permits limited criticism of its economic reform policies, though always in the context of official party or union meetings. The Government remains sensitive to any criticism of its human rights record.

The World Bank ranks Mali as one of the world's poorest countries. Landlocked and lacking easily exploitable mineral resources, Mali's economy has been based on farming and animal husbandry, both of which have been severely affected in recent years by drought.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no reported incidents of politically motivated killing during 1984 in Mali.

b. Disappearance

There were no reported incidents of disappearance, abduction, or hostage-taking during 1984 in Mali.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Government of Mali does not condone police brutality, but physical abuse of suspects has been used in police interrogation. Torture rarely occurs and never as a form of punishment. Public beatings by the citizenry of persons identified as thieves are known to occur, though not regularly.

When present, police will take such persons into custody rather than leave them to impromptu "public justice." Prisons in Mali are not cruel or inhuman by design, but lack of resources creates poor physical and health conditions. Amnesty International has expressed concern over conditions in the maximum security prisons in the harsh northern desert. Some prisoners are put on work crews and face long hours of hard manual labor in the heat of the day. Occasional deaths are attributed to such harsh conditions.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

There were no reports of arbitrary arrests or exile during 1984 in Mali. The Malian judicial system is based on the French model, and the principle of habeas corpus does not exist. Bail is not available, but prisoners are sometimes released on their own recognizance. Prisoners are usually allowed access to a lawyer of their choosing. Administrative backlogs often cause delays in bringing people to trial. Former government officials have on occasion been held without trial until they have repaid embezzled funds.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Trials are generally short in duration. The defense lawyer will tend to argue mitigating circumstances as the prisoner has usually admitted guilt. The verdict and sentence are rendered by a panel of three judges. The appeals process is limited to presidential pardon or call for a new trial. The judiciary is part of the executive branch and therefore potentially subject to interference. However, the court process is more likely to be subverted by private, influential means than by government interference. A special court of state security hears cases on diversion or embezzlement of government funds and operates as the criminal courts do. This court held several trials in 1984. Finally, the National Assembly can convene the high court of justice to hear cases against the state ministers. This court did not meet during 1984.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Mali's Constitution guarantees the inviolability of the home. Searches are infrequent and warrants are issued and recorded, albeit sometimes after the fact.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech or of the press is not guaranteed by the Malian Constitution, and is in fact limited. The state controls all Malian media and does not permit criticism of its authority. However, criticism of specific programs, aspects of society, or the performance of government offices (rarely individuals) is allowed limited expression.

Journalists, who are all government employees, have been suspended or fired due to "impertinent" questioning, but in general have not been subjected to harsh reprisals. Private publications of unauthorized information or opinions are not tolerated, but international publications, even those critical of Mali or its Government, are readily available and circulate freely.

b Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Malian Constitution guarantees the liberty of citizens to form organizations to protect their "professional interests," but in reality only selected organizations qualify for this freedom. Other than urban professional associations, the only groups which assemble freely are the women's, youth, and labor associations of Mali's single political party. Government refusal to authorize an independent student union led in part to student protests in 1981. Despite party affiliation, Mali's national labor union does maintain a degree of autonomy from the Government, even to the point of criticizing government wage practices and layoffs of workers. Strikes are permitted. Social and religious gatherings or large groups require permits which are routinely granted.

c. Freedom of Religion

Mali is a secular state, and the Government generally holds to a policy of not discriminating on religious grounds. Ninety percent of Malians are Muslim, but most other religions are practiced freely and permitted to establish houses of worship and schools. Christian missionaries of various faiths enjoy government cooperation and are free to proselytize. Religious conversion is permitted. However, the Bahai are forbidden to proselytize or establish houses of worship, although they are free to practice their faith otherwise.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Freedom of movement in Mali is generally unimpeded, although travelers are sometimes subject to police checks, especially at night. These are allowed by law, ostensibly to restrict the movement of stolen or contraband goods. In practice, some underpaid police and gendarmes are known to supplement their usually delayed salaries by assessing fines or confiscating goods. Malians are free to change residence or workplace. Foreign travel requires an exit visa. Emigration is viewed as a relief for poor economic conditions, and repatriation is not restricted. Africans from neighboring countries are generally allowed to reside in Mali and to seek employment.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The only legal political party, the Democratic Union of the Malian People, is the supreme political entity in Mali. The Government is highly centralized and important policies and decisions are made among a small group--the President, the 19-member Central Executive Bureau (which includes representatives from all major political and regional groups in Mali), and the Council of Ministers. In these circumstances, there is no opportunity for citizens to change their government or have influence outside the centralized structure. Both the party and the Government have representative bodies composed of delegates elected country-wide every three years (the last local elections concluded in September 1984), but these groups meet only twice a year in regular session. Party elections at the local level are often contested with multiple candidates, while National Assembly elections usually have a single candidate selected by the party for each seat. The National Assembly debates proposed legislation only after acceptance by the Council of Ministers and review by the Supreme Court.

The role of the military has decreased in recent years but is still important. Five of the 19 Executive Bureau members, 5 of the 17 cabinet ministries, 4 of the 7 regional governorships, and numerous lower level positions are currently held by military officers.

While women are free to participate in the Malian political process and are present at all levels of Government and the party, they continue to be underrepresented. Many women are actively involved in governmental and party life at the local level. A limited number of women occupy positions of responsibility in most ministries. There is one woman in the cabinet (Minister of Information), one in the Executive Bureau (President of the women's union), and two representatives in the National Assembly. The National Union of Malian Women is an active political organization under party auspices and a channel through which women can voice their concerns.

While the Government avoids reference to ethnic "quotas," in practice, virtually all ethnic groups are represented at the highest state and party levels. In local government, it is the Government's practice to assign officials to serve outside their native regions. Although some nomadic groups prefer to remain outside the economic and political mainstream, Mali remains virtually free of ethnic tension.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government of Mali in the past has been generally responsive to calls by recognized groups such as Amnesty International in regard to reported human rights violations. However, according to Amnesty International's 1984 Report (for 1983), Mali did not respond to its appeal of October 1983 expressing concern about alleged cruel, inhuman, and degrading treatment of political and other prisoners at two remote desert prisons. Mali itself has no known local human rights organizations. Human rights issues are handled officially by the Ministries of Foreign Affairs and Justice. Mali does not play a major role in international human rights forums and has not been the focus of scrutiny in these meetings. Mali is a signatory to the U.N. Convenants on Civil and Political Rights and on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, and the African Charter on Human and People's Rights. Freedom House terms Mali "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Mali is ranked as one of the poorest countries in the world. Real per capita GNP ($177 in 1982) has stagnated. Mali's resources in no way match the country's needs. The country is caught between the recognition that true development may be slow and long-term and the immediate needs of a population which has little or no resources, due in part to the vagaries of nature and government policies. Economic opportunities and emergency food aid resources appear to be distributed on a non-discriminatory basis, but Malians living closer to or in urban centers or who work for the government generally have greater access to government services and resources. The same is true of education and health care, the latter of which is poor even in the capital.

Mali's population is 7,562,000 people and growing at a rate of 2.3 percent annually. Malians born in 1984 can expect to live an average of 45 years. While life expectancy has increased, deteriorating health conditions due to the severe drought during the past 3 years, have also led to a rise of infant mortality from 168.4 per thousand in 1983 to 174.3 per thousand in 1984. Caloric intake has been dropping rather than rising. Only a relatively small percentage of the population (9 percent) has access to safe water, although the percentage is higher for urban dwellers (42 percent) than for rural dwellers (3 percent). Education is free to all but only 9 percent of the population is literate. Of the 27 percent of the children who do attend school, approximately 40 percent are female and 60 percent male.

The role of women is negatively affected in Mali more by social, cultural, and general poverty factors than by political or economic determinants. Custom often restricts women to "women's issues" when they do participate in politics. The women's union promotes health and education issues and has disseminated information on the disadvantages of female circumcision, but the practice is still widely followed, without government sanction, throughout Mali.

MAURITANIA

Mauritania is governed by the Military Committee for National Salvation, established in the wake of a bloodless 1978 coup which removed the civilian President, abolished the parliamentary system established at independence in 1960, and placed the administrative apparatus under military control. Colonel Maaouyia Sidi Ahmed Ould Taya, in his role as President of the Committee, is Chief of State. He assumed power after the peaceful ouster of the former President, Lt. Col. Mohamed Khouna Ould Haidalla, on December 12, 1984. All 20 members of the Military Committee retain ministerial portfolios or occupy other key government posts. Most decisions are reached by consensus, ratified at weekly plenary sessions, and promulgated by decree in the name of the Committee. Prospects for an early return to civilian rule appear remote; the military remains the "custodian of the nation's sovereignty."

The country faces daunting problems: drought, the Western Sahara conflict, racial tensions, slavery (officially abolished in 1980), and the 1980 Islamic legal code (Shari'a). The recent intensification of the 15-year drought has largely destroyed agricultural resources and the nomadic culture of the Maurs. The gradual disappearance of traditional cultural and religious centers has generated a sense of crisis, and the explosive growth of the refugee camps threatens the viability of the state. The development of social and legal institutions in Mauritania, and indeed the country's hope for the future, are hostage to this ecological and demographic calamity.

In early 1984, public disturbances related to a controversial decision to recognize the Saharan Democratic Arab Republic led to confrontations between security forces and the demonstrators in several parts of the capital and at least one outlying city. Arrests and confinements were followed by accusations that the police had used excessive force and by charges that two of the detainees died of torture. The deaths did occur, but there is no evidence that they resulted from torture. This event, highly unusual in this traditional society, generated a strong negative reaction in the general populace, as well as in the Government and the Military Committee. Government allegations of foreign involvement led to the expulsion of all Libyan diplomats and teachers.

The larger application of individual rights as articulated in the Universal Declaration of the Rights of Man confronts well-entrenched traditions in a country which was lightly touched by the European colonial experience. Limited opportunities for females to participate in political life, barriers to social mobility, and difficulties of access to employment imposed by traditional tribal family connections remain basic issues. Most serious of all are the remnants of slavery, which has survived three attempts at abolition, and Arabization issues concerning the law and schools. Maurs and blacks have clashed, sometimes violently, over such issues.

Assemblies devoted to public discussion other than those under government sponsorship are forbidden. The media are tightly controlled and opposition groups are banned. The "Structure for the Education of the Masses," advertised as an indigenous and peaceful revolution free from all imported ideological systems, has led to discussion groups and self-help committees in most larger communities. Former President Haidalla encouraged the Structure as a vehicle for the articulation of popular grievances, for undertaking civic action projects, and for finding local ways to combat desertification.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There have been no reports in 1984 of politically motivated killings.

b. Disappearance

There were no cases of politically inspired disappearances during 1984.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Mauritanian law prohibits the use of torture, and there is no evidence that it was practiced in 1984, although there were charges that two deaths resulted from torture. There is no record of summary executions or of degrading treatment of prisoners. Public flogging is still occasionally staged.

Although the Government remains opposed to slavery and has established a commission to implement abolition decrees, forced labor practices still exist. The United Nations Subcommission on Human Rights visited Mauritania in early 1984. Its report recognized both the continued, limited existence of the practice and the serious, though not very effective, efforts of the Government to stamp it out. Thus Mauritania's 1980 Declaration of the Abolition of Slavery can be said to represent a statement of intent, but it is not possible as yet to measure the extent of its effect on the residual slavery that still exists. The institution persists largely in southern Mauritania, where it originated in conflicts between nomadic Maurs and settled blacks, even though outlawed by French colonial administrators and proscribed in the Constitution promulgated at independence in 1960. Slavery in Mauritania is not identifiable with chattel servitude of the American historical experience. There is no well-developed market for slaves, and the large class of descendants of slaves and freed slaves is regulated by complex social obligations. Many freed slaves still give part of their wages to their former masters, many of whom provide food and clothing and sometimes guarantee employment for the former slaves.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Mauritanian law guarantees expeditious arraignment and trial, access to legal counsel, and right of appeal. An exception, based on legislation enacted before the 1978 coup, is the prerogative to detain, without trial or appeal, anyone judged to be a threat to national security. Detainees are usually confined to their residences, but prisons for the more serious cases exist in both Nouakchott and Jereida (maximum security).

Before his ouster, former President Haidalla on November 20, 1984, released on bail 6 political prisoners, including the former heads of the national labor union and the student union. The new regime of President Taya released 32 political prisoners on December 17 and an additional 133 detainees on December 19. Those released included a former Prime Minister and well-known opponents of the former regime, including prisoners named by Amnesty International as "prisoners of conscience" or those who were subjects of Amnesty International interest. On December 21, the Government declared a general amnesty for 69 persons convicted of political crimes living in Mauritania or abroad. The amnesty was coupled with an invitation to all Mauritanians in exile to return home to participate in a program of national revival.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

An inadequate and under-financed judicial system results in suspects being held for long periods before trial. The Shari'a Islamic code, as instituted in Mauritania in 1980, covers adultery, personal theft, and murder. A Muslim judge presides over a jury chosen by the governor of the region. The defendant has a right to counsel and can appeal a guilty verdict to the Supreme Islamic Court within 15 days.

Circumstantial evidence cannot be admitted as proof of guilt. Admission of guilt is sometimes obtained in the context of a promised reduction in punishment. An inability to convince the sitting magistrate that the Government's charges are in error in itself is considered by the courts as a legal admission of guilt, as is the convincing testimony of a first-hand witness or co-defendant. Extended confinement is sometimes used to encourage self-incrimination. All sentences must be approved by the President. Opposition to the Shari'a code has been expressed by certain blacks and women, who believe that the Shari'a code favors the Maur way of life and limits the role of women.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence.

Government interference in private affairs, save in instances where treason is suspected, is limited. Reflecting the nomadic penchant for privacy and the sanctity of confidences, a lack of sophisticated equipment to undertake surveillance, and the isolation of various parts of the country from one another, the Government limits its surveillance to patrols on major highways, occasional night-time inspection of vehicular traffic, and inspection of mail suspected of containing currency or prohibited items. Indeed, the Government is often ignorant of information required for the protection of the public welfare, because lines of communication run more readily along family lines than through a bureaucratic chain of command. Association with foreigners and the expression of opinion is not discouraged, although most Mauritanians are careful not to propagate patently seditious opinions. Shortwave broadcasts and Senegalese television are followed openly. Videotapes on a wide variety of subjects circulate freely in Nouakchott. The Government enforces strictly its prohibition of public meetings addressing political themes, and the single newspaper is totally controlled by the Government, but ideology is low-key.

MAURITANIA

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and press is restricted. Mauritania's only newspaper, news agency, and radio/television station are government-operated. The Government does not permit criticism of its policies or authority, and editorial content of the media is controlled. International news magazines and newspapers generally circulate freely in Mauritania, even when they contain articles critical of the Government. However, public sale of certain magazines is prohibited.

Private dissent is lively, and family and clan networks act as vehicles for communicating complaints and airing dissent. The nomadic tradition also provides for candid expressions of concern to the leadership, and former President Haidalla often encountered frank and candid expressions of opinion on a wide variety of subjects when he toured the provinces. In practice, the Government appears to concern itself only with activities directly related to the destablization or overthrow of the military government.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of peaceful assembly has been suspended since 1978 when the military assumed control of the country. Following the reorganization of the Military Committee in April 1979, and again after the March 16, 1981, coup attempt, curfews were imposed to discourage public gatherings. There were no curfews imposed in 1984, but the aftermath of the spring disorders sharply reduced vehicular and pedestrian traffic in the late evening almost automatically.

Labor unions were the only political organizations not dissolved after the 1978 military coup. All union activities are supervised by the Union of Mauritanian Workers, a governmental organization attached to the Ministry of Employment and Training. Unions are recognized only when they register with the official body and accept an appointed director general. Local union officials state there are approximately 26,000 members now. Union membership is not universal; workers must pay an annual membership fee of $4.00 but the Government indirectly finances most union activities. The right to strike exists in theory, but an extended strike would probably be strongly opposed by the Government. A demonstration did take place early in 1984, allegedly as the result of black discontent with Maur domination of the Union. The police used tear gas to break it up, but no known arrests occurred.

c. Freedom of Religion

Islam is the official religion of Mauritania; the country's official name is the Islamic Republic of Mauritania. Virtually all citizens are Muslim. Proselytism and the construction of churches and other non-Islamic houses of worship are prohibited without express government permission, which has been granted in several instances, however, to Mauritania's small Roman Catholic community. Several Catholic churches operate freely. There are no restrictions on personal religious expression, but in 1982 some members of the Bahai faith were threatened with expulsion for alleged proselytizing activities. There were no such reports in 1984. There is no religious discrimination in employment.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no restrictions on movement within the country, although travelers are frequently subjected to routine police checks. Mauritanians must obtain an exit visa to travel abroad, but there are no barriers to emigration or repatriation. A few Mauritanian officials have left the country because of political opposition to the Government. The Western Sahara conflict has led to a small immigration of refugees from the war into Nouadhibou and other northern towns, but there are no political refugees in Mauritania.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The right of citizens to change their government has not existed since 1978 when the military abolished Mauritania's only political party. At the present time there are no elected representatives and opposition groups are not tolerated. As illustrated by the December 12, 1984 ouster of former President Haidalla, changes in leadership come strictly from within the military.

In 1980, a civilian prime minister was appointed and a draft constitution was published providing for a democratic multiparty system, but progress toward democratization ceased following the late 1980 discovery of an alleged Libyan-inspired plot to take over the Government and merge Mauritania and Libya into a single state, and the March 1981 attempted coup. A military prime minister replaced the civilian incumbent and efforts to restore constitutional rule were suspended. In 1984 the Government attempted to encourage public participation in community activities as the Structure for Education of the Masses became better established. The movement has emphasized decentralization of the Government decisionmaking process and expanded scope for local initiative. It is also intended to reduce tribal and ethnic antagonism and to parry threats posed by foreign ideologies. To date the principal focus has been on raising popular awareness of the danger posed by the drought, but citizens have used the Structure as a vehicle to criticize certain government policies and officials.

The black population is represented at all levels of government, but in numbers far less than its proportion of the total population. Many blacks claim that the Maurs are substantially overrepresented in the Government and religious institutions, since blacks believe they constitute a majority of the population. The Government insists, however, that a substantial majority of Mauritanians are Maurs. A sizable segment of the black population (blacks whose mother tongue is Hassaniyya Arabic) is considered by the Government, and considers itself, to be Maurs.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Haidalla regime was aware of the continuing Amnesty International concerns over a number of human rights issues, but considered that the majority of the specific charges were based on misinformation. Nonetheless, the attention paid to these issues by the foreign press and foreign governments made the Government conscious of the potential cost of violations, and highly sensitive to criticism.

In August 1981, the U.N. Human Rights Subcommission's Working Group on Slavery heard a report from the London-based Anti-Slavery Society on slavery in Mauritania. The report accused the Mauritanian Government of taking no action to abolish slavery beyond the 1980 edict declaring it illegal. The Government regarded the report as misleading and invited the Subcommission to send an expert to Mauritania, which it did in early 1984. The expert's preliminary conclusions included recognition of the Government's efforts to eliminate the "vestiges" of slavery, but noted that these vestiges continue to carry considerable weight in Mauritania.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Mauritania's economy, always marginal, has been subject to drought for more than a decade, which has intensified in the last two years, decimating the livestock and reducing indigenous food production to less than 10 percent of the national requirements. Mineral exports, which account for 85 percent of the country's foreign exchange earnings, have been hindered by poor planning, increasing debt, and logistical problems. Investment in new iron ore mines undertaken since 1978 may extend the life of known deposits beyond the year 2000, but only more buoyant world prices are likely to reduce the enormous debt burden incurred. Drought and high import prices for food and energy have reduced the monetary reserves to a low level. The lack of rain, coupled with the war in the Western Sahara, contributed to a rapid population shift to urban areas. Nouakchott, a new city built to accommodate 30,000 inhabitants, now contains a population estimated at over 400,000, out of a total national population of 1,623,000. Elemental needs in hygiene, education, social services, employment, and economic development far exceed what the Government can provide.

Small business enterprises are an important part of Mauritania's economy; food stands and shops flourish in the towns. The Government dominates large-scale industry, however, and nearly all major services and utilities are run by state-owned firms. These firms offer entrepreneurial opportunities to Mauritanians who possess capital to invest; but only limited employment opportunities for poor, unskilled Mauritanians. Just as Maurs tend to predominate in senior government positions, they appear to enjoy favored access to senior positions in the state-owned sector.

In the rural sector, a small population scattered over a vast landscape is far removed from many governmental services. As the drought has intensified, government efforts have been concentrated on supplying essential foodstuffs received from international donors to a population increasingly malnourished; in large areas the rural population is almost completely dependent on food assistance. Instances have been recorded of hoarding, illegal sale of donated food supplies, and withholding of vital nourishment from slaves and children, which take place despite efforts of the Government to change isolated communities' traditional responses to the prospect of famine. The calorie supply as a percent of requirements (1977 figure) is 84.98 percent. Mortality rates among infants (in 1984, 138.30 per 1,000) and the elderly are expected by medical authorities to rise during the coming year despite a multinational emergency food assistance effort now under way. Life expectancy at birth is 45.43 (1984); the population growth rate is 2 percent (1984).

Inequities in income distribution (GNP per capita is $465.80--1982) are more pronounced in Mauritania than in its West African neighbors, in part because Mauritania's iron ore and fisheries exports require heavy investment of capital, technological expertise, and management skills. The tax system is progressive, although few Mauritanians appear to pay their true tax assessment. Private sector initiatives are protected and encouraged. In education, the Government's task is complicated by the very sharp divisions between the Arabic-speaking Maur population and the blacks, who have traditionally preferred to be educated in French and local languages rather than in Arabic. The Government abandoned plans in 1981 for total Arabization of the educational system after encountering widespread opposition. The primary school enrollment in 1981 is 33.90 percent (1980) of the eligible age group. Mauritania's literacy rate remains very low--17.40 percent (1976)--and those aspiring to advanced training look for financial assistance to go abroad. For Mauritanians who obtain such an education, employment prospects in Mauritania are bleak.

Traditional cultural and social values limit the role of Mauritanian women in government and business. Some women have risen to prominent positions in the fields of health and education, and many women are employed as teachers and middle- or low-level government bureaucrats. While women are free to participate in governmental affairs and business, few women attempt to combine a career with their family responsibilities. Statistics indicate that only half as many women as men avail themselves of educational opportunities, a phenomenon which may be due to cultural, rather than legal, constraints. The Government has recently recommended the establishment of an office for women's affairs.

MAURITIUS

Mauritius is a small, densely-populated island country with a parliamentary democracy modeled after that of Great Britain. Mauritius is governed by a Prime Minister, a Council of Ministers, and a Legislative Assembly. Parliamentary, municipal, and village council elections take place at regular intervals. A Governor General with largely ceremonial powers is appointed on the advice of the Prime Minister and represents Queen Elizabeth II, who is also titular head of state as Queen of Mauritius.

Political and civil rights are protected under the Mauritian Constitution and exercised in practice. There are four major political parties with wide-ranging ideologies, and a host of minor parties. Executive power has changed hands twice in the last three years through general elections supervised by an independent electoral commission. Over 80 percent of eligible voters participated in these elections. Religious freedom is uninhibited in this multi-religious society, which includes large Hindu, Christian, and Muslim populations. Mauritius has a free and active press, with 11 newspapers for a population of one million. There are about 290 labor unions which enjoy considerable freedom in contract negotiations and within the political arena, but their right to strike is limited by law.

Mauritius' independent judiciary administers a legal system based principally on the British model. Since independence in 1968, there have been no substantiated reports of political killings, disappearances, torture, or degrading treatment of prisoners. There is equal protection for women under the law, although women remain underrepresented in the upper echelons of government and business.

Mauritius has a per capita income of $1,240. Its mixed economy, based on sugar production, tourism, and simple manufacture for export, including textiles, has both a strong private sector and a number of state-owned enterprises. In 1984, the economy started to pull out of a recession, and unemployment, which peaked to 25 percent in 1983, fell to about 20 percent by mid-1984. In recent years, Mauritius has adopted austerity readjustment policies consistent with guidelines from the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. Health and education systems are state-supported, and of generally adequate quality. The literacy rate is 79 percent.

There were unsubstantiated allegations of government petty harassment of opposition figures in 1984, including surveillance and wiretaps. Political activity continued at an active pace, however. Political rallies were held regularly, and a major congress by the leading opposition party attracted about 40,000 supporters in September. Opposition newspapers constantly criticized policies and public figures of the governing coalition. A law to require newspapers to post a $20,000 bond against libel suits was passed by Parliament in March, but was not implemented following widespread protests.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no reports of political killings in 1984. There have been no such reports since independence in 1968.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of disappearance of persons in Mauritius for political causes.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture or inhuman punishment is prohibited by law. Although there have been no reports of degrading treatment or punishment, there have been reports of serious overcrowding in local prisons.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

There have been no reports of arbitrary arrests and/or detention since the early 1970's, when opposition political and trade union leaders were jailed, accused of creating chaos and anarchy. Habeas corpus exists in practice, and a person can be held only up to 48 hours without being charged. Bail is common. Exile has never been used in Mauritius as a means of punishment.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Mauritius' judicial system, modeled on that of Great Britain, consists of a Supreme Court with appellate powers and a series of lower courts. Final appeal to the Queen's Privy Council in the United Kingdom is provided for by the Constitution. There are no political or military courts. The courts have a very good record of assuring fair, public trials to those charged with crimes. Defendants have the right to private or court-appointed legal counsel. There have been no allegations by political parties, human rights groups, or the media of political bias in the judiciary. In the past the judiciary has made several politically unpopular decisions, such as finding a prominent minister guilty of corruption.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The sanctity of the home is guaranteed by law and respected in practice. The search of personal property or premises is allowed only under clearly specified conditions by court order, or by police decision if an illegal act has been committed. There are no reports of arbitrary intrusion by the state or political organizations into the private lives of individuals. There have been unproven allegations that the Government through its intelligence apparatus occasionally opens mail, carries out wiretaps, and exercises surveillance on opposition leaders.

MAURITIUS

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and press is protected both in the Constitution and in practice. Eleven privately owned daily and weekly newspapers, representing widely varying hues of the political spectrum, freely express partisan views. Newspapers are subject only to the legal constraints of libel laws. In April 1984, the Parliament passed the Newspaper and Periodicals Act which, among other things, required each newspaper to post a bond equivalent to $20,000 to cover possible liability in legal suits, a large sum by Mauritian standards. After a series of protests by journalists and the opposition party, during which 44 journalists were arrested for civil disturbances, a government commission, led by the former Supreme Court Chief Justice, was formed to review the Bill. The Commission advised the Government not to implement the Act and not to prosecute the journalists. The Government accepted these recommendations.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

There are no legal proscriptions against the right of individuals to form associations, including political parties, trade unions, and religious associations. Although the Public Order Act requires police permission for demonstrations and mass meetings, such permission is rarely refused. Political, cultural, religious, and other mass assemblies are commonplace. For example, a congress sponsored by the opposition party in September/October 1984 was held without incident and played host to some 40,000 followers. This was in the tradition of the 1982 and 1983 parliamentary campaign, when daily political rallies of the competing parties regularly attracted large numbers without any reports of violence or civil disorder.

Mauritius has one of the freest and most widespread trade union movements in Africa, with seven trade union confederations and numerous unaffiliated unions. With about 290 unions the Mauritian labor movement represents some 90,000 workers, over one-fourth of the work force. The largest confederation, the Mauritian Labor Congress, is a member of the democratically-oriented International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. Unions are free to press wage demands, link with domestic political parties and international organizations, and address political issues. One of the leading federations actively supports the opposition party. Nonetheless, some union officials charge that the Industrial Relations Act, which requires a 21-day cooling-off period, followed by binding arbitration, has the effect of making most strikes illegal. Others claim that the ease of registering a union, requiring only seven members, has been used to fragment the union movement in Mauritius. The Government is considering new legislation to amend the Industrial Relations Act to respond to these complaints.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is no official state religion in Mauritius. Christians, Hindus, Muslims, Buddhists, as well as a number of other religions and sects, openly practice and teach their own religion without prejudice. All religious institutions receive state subsidies in proportion to their number of adherents. There is no state-sanctioned discrimination against any of Mauritius' ethnic and religious communities. Political candidates are often chosen on the basis of their ethnic or religious affinity and the composition of the particular electoral constituency. In the National Parliament, 8 of the 70 members are selected via a complex "best loser" system, designed in part to assure that all ethnic groups are adequately represented. There have been allegations that certain communities, particularly the Muslim, are underrepresented in the civil service, particularly at higher levels.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no restrictions on movement within the country, foreign travel, emigration, and repatriation. Fewer than 10 people have applied for refugee status in Mauritius during the past 3 years. There is no forcible repatriation.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Mauritius is a participatory democracy with a parliamentary system patterned after that of Great Britain. The country is governed by a freely elected, unicameral legislative assembly, with executive direction coming from a Council of Ministers headed by the Prime Minister. The parliamentary opposition is headed by an official leader elected by opposition members of the legislative assembly. Although there have been proposals to make Mauritius a republic, a Governor General appointed on the advice of the Prime Minister still represents Queen Elizabeth II, who is also Queen of Mauritius. The Governor General's role is largely ceremonial, with real executive power resting with the Prime Minister. The Governor General could play a significant role, however, should elections be very close, since he would designate the person he believes could best form a new government. Voting and running for office are open to all citizens 18 years of age and over.

Women in Mauritius are free to participate in all types of political, business, and social activities, and a few hold high positions. Nonetheless, conservative religious and ethnic attitudes do inhibit women, and only 4 of the 70 parliament members and 1 of 19 ministers are women.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

There are no known reports of requests by outside or domestic organizations to investigate the human rights situation in Mauritius. Amnesty International maintains two branches in Mauritius. There is also a local Roman Catholic human rights organization, the Justice and Peace Commission. Neither of these organizations has expressed concern with the Government of Mauritius about its human rights situation. Amnesty International did not have an entry on Mauritius in its 1984 Report. Freedom House rates Mauritius "free."

MAURITIUS

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Mauritius is a small, relatively prosperous island state with a population of just over one million and a 1982 per capita gross national product of $1,240. The Mauritian economy is based on sugar production, tourism, and simple manufactures such as textiles. A strong private sector works hand-in-hand with the Government and with state-owned enterprises. The recent international recession hit Mauritius hard, cutting foreign demand for manufactures, lowering world sugar prices, and reducing tourism. Unemployment rose to about 25 percent at the end of 1983, with serious impact on the poorer segments of the population. Despite Government efforts to expand its unemployment insurance program and a large social security fund, an effective social safety net does not yet exist. Still, the economy picked up somewhat in 1984, with a net increase of about 10,000 jobs. Unemployment fell to about 20 percent. Fewer than one in eight Mauritians are below the absolute poverty level, the same as in 1979.

The revival in 1984 was complemented by expanded assistance from bilateral and multilateral sources, including the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. In accordance with large loans from these agencies, the Government of Mauritius has adopted an austere program of structural readjustment, designed to reduce government involvement in the economy, encourage industrial and tourism expansion, diversify agriculture, and rejuvenate the sugar sector.

Mauritius places a high priority on education, with the Education Ministry receiving the largest ministerial allocation in the 1984/85 budget: about $38 million. Education in both English and French is free and accessible to all through secondary school. Enrollment at the primary level is virtually universal. Adult literacy is 79 percent (1980 figure). The nation's only university teaches a technical curriculum to 400 students. Other secondary school graduates must go abroad for university education.

Medical care is available to all Mauritians through an expanding network of free government hospitals and clinics. The system emphasizes basic health needs and preventive care. Those requiring complex treatment must travel abroad. With one of the world's highest population densities, Mauritius has stressed mother-child health care and family planning. The infant mortality rate has declined to about 30 per 1,000 live births according to World Bank data, while the population growth rate has been halved in the past two decades to 1.3 percent in 1984. Life expectancy at birth is about 67 years. Malnutrition is not a serious problem, even in the poorer rural areas, with calorie supply exceeding nutritional requirements by 14 percent in 1977, the latest available data. The Government has also concentrated on expanding access to safe water, especially in rural sectors, where only about one in five had such access in 1975. In urban areas 100 percent of the population has access to safe water. With the help of foreign donors, including the U.S. Agency for International Development, about half the rural sector now has potable water.

The Mauritian Government is on record as seeking to improve the status of women. Recent amendments to laws ranging from emigration to inheritence have removed sexually discriminatory sections. The emphasis on mother-child health care has encouraged food supplements for pregnant women, greater prenatal care, and female education. There is a Ministry of Women's Rights and Family Affairs, headed by a woman. Nonetheless, despite a six-fold increase in the 1984/85 budget, this Ministry receives only $300,000. The literacy rate in 1980 for women was 73 percent, compared to 86 percent for men. Women tend to occupy the less skilled and lower paid jobs in the economy, such as operators in the textile plants. They are particularly susceptible to layoffs during economic downturns.

MOZAMBIQUE

After five centuries as a Portuguese colony, Mozambique gained independence in 1975 following a decade of guerrilla warfare waged by FRELIMO (Front for the Liberation of Mozambique), which then took power. The Government is run by a Council of Ministers appointed by the President, who is also the head of the FRELIMO party. It is the only functioning party and establishes the general parameters of government policies. FRELIMO espouses socialism tempered by nationalism and pragmatism.

With independence, the new Government confronted growing activities of the National Resistance Movement. The sharp rise in the armed conflict in 1984 resulted in serious incidents in which civilians were frequently the victims. Trains, buses, and cars were attacked and the occupants shot and burned. Rural villages were pillaged, with the residents often killed, kidnapped, or disfigured. For their part, security forces eager to press the fight against the resistance at times also committed atrocities. Excessive measures by the security forces caused President Machel to wage a public campaign against such abuses and to replace in mid-year the Minister of Interior and the Minister of Security, both of whom had been closely associated with the harsh security measures. Dozens of other security officials were also dismissed or jailed. In March, 1984, the Government of Mozambique and the South African Government signed the Nkomati Accord, by which each side agreed not to let its territory be used as a staging area for insurgent attacks on the other. Later in 1984, negotiations began under the auspices of the South African Government to attempt to achieve a ceasefire in Mozambique. To date, no significant progress has been made in reducing hostilities.

There were some positive developments in 1984. For example, some of the most blatant abuses which took place during 1983 ceased, including the ending of public executions and public whippings. Fifty-two individuals, imprisoned for political crimes such as espionage and working for the former colonial power, were granted amnesty in September 1984. "Operation Production," instituted in 1983 to move large numbers of urban unemployed to rural areas, also came to a halt. Organized religion continued to operate with relative freedom. Nevertheless, the human rights outlook remains tenuous due to domestic violence, economic problems, and fragile social and political institutions.

Mozambique ranks among the world's poorest nations. Per capita gross national product was estimated at $376 in 1982, but has probably dropped since then. The country faces a large balance of payments deficit and has rescheduled its foreign debt. The lack of trained personnel is one of many obstacles to rapid economic and social development. About 85 percent of the population is engaged in subsistence agriculture. The economy has deteriorated steadily over the past few years as a consequence of successive natural calamities (prolonged severe drought and heavy localized flooding), disruptions caused by resistance activity, and ill-conceived economic policy. The Government is taking some remedial steps in economic policy, including: increasing support to the family and private sectors in agriculture, boosting producer prices, and controlling public sector hiring and wages. It also became a member of the IMF/IBRD system.

MOZAMBIQUE

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

The continuing war between government and resistance forces has led to the death of both Mozambican and foreign civilians. The insurgents have been brutally violent, killing, maiming, and kidnapping their targets. Government military actions have also contributed to civilian casualties in contested areas. Precise figures are unavailable, although the total number of fatalities is estimated to be in the hundreds. The insurgents have targeted, in particular, party and government officials and foreign workers. Several Portuguese are known to have been assassinated during the year, as was an Italian priest.

There were no known public executions of those convicted of economic offenses or other crimes against the state as had occurred during the previous year. At the beginning of 1984, President Machel announced a general amnesty for those rebels who voluntarily turned themselves in with their weapons. There have been no reports of harm to those taking advantage of the amnesty, although it is possible that captured rebels may have been sentenced by military tribunals which have the power to impose capital punishment in closed proceedings that do not provide for defense counsel.

b. Disappearance

Although the occasionally arbitrary nature of judicial and police activities has led to situations in which relatives and friends of detainees lose track of prisoners, there are no confirmed reports of government-sponsored disappearances. The resistance has abducted thousands, usually villagers, sometimes conscripting them into their movement. On occasion the resistance also kidnapped or killed foreign residents.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

In 1983 the Government legalized floggings for a wide range of crimes including black marketeering. There have been several reported cases of injury. Prisons are generally overcrowded and characterized by inadequate food, hygiene, and medical care. Apart from its regular prisons, the Government established, shortly after independence, "reeducation centers" in remote parts of the country where political prisoners and other "anti-social elements" (e.g., prostitutes, black marketeers, etc.) are interned. The prisoners may be given sentences of indeterminate length. Conditions at the centers are harsh and prisoners must feed and shelter themselves. Reports by occasional visitors describe extremely spartan living conditions. There have been allegations of capricious and cruel treatment by guards.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Arbitrary arrest and detention occur in Mozambique. Preventive detention may be employed if officials believe a crime is probable or imminent. Although the concept of habeas corpus is acknowledged in Mozambique law, it is not always followed. A suspect may be held up to 90 days before charges are brought in serious cases, and for shorter periods in lesser cases. This period is meant to be used for investigative purposes, and may be extended only once, for an additional 90 days, if the state requires more time to prepare its case. In practice, however, once charges are brought, prisoners sometimes languish in prison for months before they are brought to trial. Detainees may be released from prison prior to their trial but there appears to be no well-defined system of bail. There are cases where the individuals, both Mozambican and foreigners, are held incommunicado.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Partly because of the Portuguese influence, Mozambique employs an inquisitional, rather than adversary, system of justice. In cases which the court rules to be of insufficient significance, the accused are denied access to defense counsel. Public defenders are available in other cases.

The Government exerts strong influence over the judiciary, which suffers from the lack of qualified personnel and a firm institutional base. However, continuing efforts are made to train lawyers and judges.

Judgment is rendered by the judge and two or four elected jurors. In so-called people's tribunals in rural areas, individuals with only rudimentary education and legal knowledge are expected to exercise common sense and apply general principles. Military tribunals try both civilian and military personnel in cases involving "crimes against the people and state security." This definition has been expanded to include economic criminals such as black marketeers. Military tribunals operate in camera and are composed of military personnel, some of whom may have legal training. Right of appeal is recognized for non-military cases involving sentences of eight or more years, and persons sentenced to death may appeal to the President of the Republic.

There is no reliable estimate of persons detained for political reasons. Over the almost 10 years of independence, the total could add up to several thousand if reeducation camp inmates are included. There have been claims that 3,500-6,000 resistance troops are in custody. However, most observers believe there is a downward trend in the numbers of persons incarcerated for their political beliefs.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The degrading "Operation Production" which forcibly relocated thousands from large urban areas to the countryside in 1983, halted in 1984. A few of the most blatant abuses were corrected as some people were allowed back to their former dwelling places. People are not forced to belong to FRELIMO. However, the party attempts to establish local chapters in most functioning government and business organizations. There is a notable correlation of professional advancement and party membership, although it is not total.

It is widely assumed that surveillance devices are employed in local and international telecommunications systems. There have also been instances of tampering with mail, especially the international post.

MOZAMBIQUE

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

At the local level, especially in rural areas, there is considerable openness for the people to express their views on prevailing conditions. For example, magazines and newspapers often contain articles or letters to the editor complaining about the lack of goods and social services, or the ineffectiveness of a particular individual. However, no outright opposition to government policies is permitted. The Government owns all authorized publications in the country as well as the radio and experimental television facilities. The media promote the Government's general philosophy and its viewpoints on issues, but there is reporting on abuses within the system or flaws in the implementation of policies where the Government itself has admitted to errors. Journalists are subject to pressures from the government-sanctioned association of journalists to which they must belong. Despite the ban on travel of South Africa-based journalists to the southern African "Front Line States," some journalists based in South Africa continue to visit Mozambique and conduct interviews.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

While there are private groups of individuals who join together for common interests, and while religious organizations are largely autonomous, the Government does exercise influence over most associations. It also sponsors a wide variety of important bodies such as women's organizations, youth leagues, etc.

In 1983 the Government established the Mozambique Workers' Organization, intended to function as a national labor union, and which remains affiliated to the FRELIMO ruling party. However, an organized union movement has yet to develop, and labor presently has little influence on economic policy or politics. There are occasional exchanges of delegations in the labor field with other countries, especially with those of Eastern Europe. Existing labor law is generally very favorable to the employee, but in practice it is difficult to enforce because of the fragility of the institutions associated with labor. The Mozambique Workers' Organization is a member of the continent-wide, Ghana-based, Organization of African Trade Union Unity.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is no state religion in Mozambique. Although the Constitution guarantees freedom of religion, the Government has placed restrictions on the activities of religious groups. It has reserved the right to decide whether individual church buildings can be operational and whether individual clergy can visit outlying areas. It has stated its intention eventually to nationalize churches, schools, and hospitals. The Government still closely monitors religious activities, limits the number of dioceses in the country, and insists that the character of the religious groups be Mozambican and that they not act as representatives of external groups. The practice of traditional African religions is officially criticized and ridiculed but permitted.

The Government has, however, continued to relax administrative restrictions on the religious community. The right of churches to operate and follow their rites and ceremonies has been affirmed, and the Government has agreed to hear requests for reopening churches which closed during the uncertain period following independence. Government authorities have also granted the clergy greater access to outlying districts and parishes. Membership in a religious group per se does not appear to affect, either favorably or unfavorably, a person's secular standing, although, since it is incompatible with party membership, it is likely to hinder advancement in the political sphere.

d. Freedom of Movement within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Travel and relocation within the country are controlled by security and employment requirements under the rationale of assuring public and social order. Mozambicans are required to carry an identity card, work card, and residence permit. Mozambicans planning to travel outside their city of residence must obtain a travel permit from local government authorities.

Temporary visits abroad are permitted. Mozambican law does not address the issue of emigration, but in some cases would be emigrants have been imprisoned or interned in reeducation camps. Thousands fled from Mozambique at independence because of economic chaos and fears of political persecution. In the past few years, additional thousands have fled, some only temporarily because of the deteriorating security situation created by the guerrilla war and because of continuing economic hardship including the drought. In 1981 the Government announced a policy of welcoming back Mozambicans who had left the country, and in 1982 it passed a law allowing for the reacquisition of citizenship for Mozambicans who had left the country and assumed another nationality. Initially, some Mozambicans who had opposed the party before independence were jailed upon their return to the country. More recently, Mozambicans who have accepted the Government's invitation to return have apparently not suffered harassment or retribution.

Mozambique is not a party to any international agreement on the status of refugees. The Government has not been known to repatriate forcibly refugees to countries in which they fear persecution. Most refugees in Mozambique come from South Africa, Latin America, and Malawi. Despite Mozambique's weak economy, the Government has contributed to the welfare of these refugees.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The only legal party, FRELIMO, dominates political activity in the country. The party and the Government are controlled by a small cadre of senior officials. While structures for a mass political involvement exist at the provincial, district, and local levels, they do not provide significant citizen participation. The party and Government espouse a system of "People's Democracy" where decisions are made by consensus; in practice this means that policies and initiatives emanate from above. Election to representative bodies is made from a single slate and the electorate has the option of endorsing or rejecting candidates pre-selected by the party. Votes by the National People's Assembly endorsing government policies are usually unanimous. Individual ethnic groups are treated equally, and tribal affiliation appears to have slight correlation to political outlook. The number of ethnic Indian and white Mozambicans holding important positions is disproportionately high, a reflection of their greater educational opportunities.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Mozambique is a member of the United Nations Human Rights Commission. Amnesty International's 1984 Report (covering 1983) expressed concern about the long-term detention without trial of suspected opponents of the Government, including some reported detainees arrested before independence in 1975; unfair trial procedures; and allegations of beatings and ill-treatment of prisoners. Freedom House describes Mozambique as "not free." The Government claims to be holding several thousand resistance adherents, but so far has not allowed international relief organizations access to them.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Mozambique has a population estimated at 13.4 million, 85 percent of which is engaged in subsistence agriculture. Because of drought, lack of security, and mismanagement, food production has fallen far short of domestic requirements. Accordingly, the country spent a significant amount of its meager foreign exchange on food imports and relied on very sizable food aid grants from abroad, including emergency aid from the U.S. Although the drought conditions have improved, considerable foreign food aid will still be required in 1985. In 1977, caloric supply available for consumption was estimated to be only 81.5 percent of nutritional requirements. The Government does not actively promote population control programs and the population growth rate was estimated at 2.8 percent in 1984.

The industrial sector also faces severe problems. Productivity has suffered from shortages of raw materials, equipment, spare parts, and trained personnel. A lack of foreign exchange has prevented the country from easing the shortages through imports. As a result, most factories operate at less than 50 percent capacity, and even companies that produce for export have work stoppages.

The economic system is socialist and governmental enterprises dominate all sectors of the economy. Individuals are allowed to operate small businesses, but the right to own property is restricted. In 1983 the Government indicated publicly that small private farming should be encouraged and began to turn land over to the private sector. Mozambique continues to solicit foreign investment. Various companies have begun to explore for oil and gas. The Government published an investment code in 1984, signed an agreement with the U.S. Overseas Private Investment Corporation, and joined the IMF and IBRD. Medical care is significantly better in metropolitan areas. For example, the infant mortality rate now averages 141.0 per 1,000 nationwide, but varies from a low of 35-40 per thousand in sections of the capital to a high of 200 per thousand in some rural areas. Life expectancy at birth is 51.3 years but, again, there are wide differences among various parts of the country.

MOZAMBIQUE

The Government continued its inoculation campaign, aimed primarily at children. Because so many of them are malnourished, children are particularly susceptible to disease (measles is a major killer), and as many as 40 percent of all deaths in the country occur among children under the age of five. Probably less than 10 percent of the population has access to safe water supplies and, even in large cities, outbreaks of cholera occur.

Education continues to be a priority. The Government has emphasized teacher training programs, particularly in rural areas. The World Bank estimated that the primary school enrollment ratio was 68.2 (78.3 for males, 58.3 for females) in 1981. Even taking into account that these figures include adults enrolled in primary school, they would appear to be high. A more realistic estimate would be a ratio of 50 to 60 for both males and females. Furthermore, even the lower figure can be misleading because of the poor quality of schools. Similarly, the World Bank estimated the literacy rate at 33.2 percent in 1980. Although the literacy rate has risen as a result of government programs, a rate of 20 percent (including those who are only semi-literate) would probably be more accurate. Other than the inequalities between rural and urban areas, the Government attempts to apportion social services more or less equally among the populations.

The status of women in Mozambique did not alter appreciably over the past year. Both the national Constitution and FRELIMO party policy provide that there shall be no discrimination on the basis of sex. In fact, however, two societies exist: a) the contemporary society of the larger urban areas; and b) the more traditional society of the rural areas. Women play a prominent role in the urban society. They have equal access to education. There is a surprisingly large number of women in the professions, the military, and within the bureaucracy, and many hold policy positions. They also engage in a wide range of economic activity, including commerce. In the political area, the Minister of Education and Culture is a woman, but no other women occupy ministerial or vice ministerial ranks. Moreover, there are no women on the FRELIMO Politburo, and women on the Central Committee are a small minority. There is a new organization devoted to women's affairs. In the rural areas, traditional practices reinforce discrimination against women. Specific customs vary according to ethnic grouping, but generally women do much of the manual labor in agriculture as well as care for the home and family. In certain ethnic groups, women may retain the earnings from cash crops they cultivate, but in most instances economic and political decisions are taken by men.

NIGER

Niger is governed by an authoritarian military regime with power concentrated in the hands of its President, General Seyni Kountche, who heads the nation's highest body, the Supreme Military Council. He took power in a military coup in 1974, toppling a civilian government which had lost popular support because of corruption and inefficiency. At the time of the coup the Constitution was suspended, and Kountche has since ruled by decree. The freedoms of assembly, expression, political activity, and movement within the country are restricted. The state's security apparatus is small but effective when coupled with the firm administration exercised by the provincial governors, all but one of whom are senior military officers. Public dissent in Niger is nonexistent, and private dissent is guarded for fear of retribution. People may, however, pursue their economic interests, and hold private property. Government administration, including the legal system, is considered generally fair and moderately efficient. Significant violations of the integrity of the individual occur but are not widespread.

Landlocked Niger occupies a large area in the arid Sahel region of West Africa. The economy is based primarily on subsistence farming, livestock, and a few cash crops. In addition, there is a mining sector dominated by uranium, of which Niger is one of the world's major producers. Poor worldwide prices and demand for uranium in recent years have had a serious negative effect on the Nigerien economy.

Overall, the state of human rights in Niger changed only slightly in 1984. In April, on the tenth anniversary of the coup which brought Kountche to power, the Government released about 20 political prisoners, including ex-President Diori. These political prisoners, connected with the 1974 coup or two subsequent coup attempts, had all been detained without trial. After these releases, the Government acknowledged that 36 political prisoners are still being held, most of them associated with an October 1983 coup attempt. The Government has indicated that those people implicated in the October 1983 coup attempt will be tried by a special military tribunal, but such a trial, if held, is expected to be in camera. An increasing preoccupation with internal security has led the Government to tighten internal restrictions on travel and population movements during 1984.

The state of human rights in Niger hinges to a great extent on how the Kountche Government deals with the internal and external threats it perceives. Internally, the economic decline was made much worse by a severe drought in 1984, probably the worst in this century. Externally, the main threat is Colonel Qadhafi, the Libyan leader, who has stated that Niger will be his next target after Chad. Nonetheless, despite these threats, the Kountche Government is proceeding with its policy of expanding the role of civilians in government and of instituting some modest political reforms to increase popular participation in government, at least in the economic sphere.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no reports in 1984 of political killings by either the Government or terrorist groups.

b. Disappearance

No disappearances were reported in Niger during 1984.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture and cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment is not believed to be practiced or condoned, but one student arrested during a student strike in 1983 died in detention shortly after his arrest. A labor official who was arrested following a dispute with the former head of the security services also died in 1983 while in detention. This individual was known to have been in poor health before his arrest and the exact cause of his death is not known. It is also not known whether the Nigerien Government investigated this case.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

There were two confirmed arrests of people for the expression of views critical of or different from the Government in 1984. In August, Customs Director Diallo Amadou Hassane and Presidential Inspector Ibrahim Samba Diallo were imprisoned for their alleged involvement in the marriage-by-proxy ceremony of a local woman with Bonkano Oummarou, the architect of the October 1983 coup against President Kountche. Both remain in detention, probably at the prison at Quallam, north of Niamey. Several other persons are believed to have been arrested in connection with the same incident. A senior military officer who reportedly criticized the Government was arrested early in 1983 and remains in detention. It is not known whether he has been formally accused or brought to trial. With the Constitution suspended, there are no specific statutory protections against arbitrary arrest or imprisonment, nor does habeas corpus exist. Warrants for arrest are not required. The law provides for a suspect to be charged within 48 hours, but delays, sometimes lasting months, occur as the result of a lack of trained, efficient legal officials. Apparently those arrested in connection with the attempted coup in 1983 have not been formally charged. The Government does not exile dissidents, but some dissidents have fled the country. There is no case of incommunicado detention. As a drought relief measure, the Government is insisting in some cases that indigents work in development projects.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

There are public trials for civil and criminal cases not involving political acts. Legal counsel is provided for indigent defendants accused of felonies or other major offenses if they are under 18 years of age, handicapped, or faced with the possibility of a sentence of more than 10 years. There is some evidence that courts are subject to political influence or pressure in ordinary civil or criminal cases. Defendants may appeal verdicts first to an appellate court and, if desired, to the nation's highest tribunal, the state court, composed of civilian magistrates, which serves in the capacity of a supreme court as a final court of appeals. The President has the right of pardon in penal cases. Islamic justice is often used on a local basis throughout the country for petty crimes.

There is also provision for a state security court to operate outside the legal framework and try political cases. Such a court will reportedly try those accused of complicity in the 1983 coup attempt, but it is expected that such a trial will be held in camera. It is assumed that a security court can review sentences of a person already in detention, but information is not available about rules, or procedures, or if defendants are entitled to counsel. There are believed to be several more political prisoners in Niger than the 36 acknowledged by the Government. Most are accused of complicity in the 1983 coup attempt or are leftover detainees from earlier coup attempts. There are no current published estimates by private organizations on the number of political prisoners.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The police have the right to enter homes between 5 a.m. and 9 p.m. but will enter at other times if they believe they have sufficient cause. A court warrant is not required. There have been no reports of forced entry, but other violations of privacy such as monitoring correspondence and the operation of an informer system occur on a selective basis. A few cases of forced population resettlement are occurring as a government response to the drought.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

These freedoms are restricted. Institutions which might voice dissent, such as an independent press or a freely elected legislature, do not exist. The government-controlled media allow only occasional minor or veiled criticism of government policies or operations. Full academic freedom does not exist. The primary function of the media is to disseminate government policies and viewpoints and to engender popular support for them, as well as for such leading government figures and entities as the President and the military. Nigerien journalists are aware of their status as government employees and of the guidelines within which they are expected and required to operate. There have been no reported deviations from these requirements. There have been no reports of censored or banned magazines, or other publications, but the Government is under no constraints should it discover material that it deems offensive. Foreign films are subject to censorship on the grounds of public morality and political content.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Except for political parties, most forms of voluntary association, such as trade unions, churches, and other religious groups, function with the understanding they operate consistent with government policy. They have no legal protection. Public meetings of such organizations are allowed, but the Government is under no restriction should it wish to limit such activity. The trade union movement exists apart from the Government and is organized in a confederation of 23 unions representing about 30 percent of the estimated 60,000 salaried workers in Niger. Although weak, poorly-financed, and subject to government influence, the trade union movement is considered fairly democratic. Meetings are frequent, and the unions have the right to organize, negotiate, and strike even though strikes are rare. The confederation maintains relations with recognized international bodies and sends representatives to international meetings. It also is a member of the Accra-based Organization of African Trade Union Unity (OATUU).

c. Freedom of Religion

Niger is overwhelmingly Muslim, but Christian Churches operate freely. Conversion from one religion to another is permitted but occurs rarely. Foreign missionaries are permitted to enter and reside in the country. There have been no reports of religious discrimination, but adherence to Islam tends to give one an advantage in all sectors of life.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Travel within Niger is closely monitored, although no special travel documents are necessary for internal travel. Police checks, often accompanied by searches, take place on the outskirts of all cities and towns, but in 1984 these controls have been enforced more severely. In addition to a longstanding concern over smuggling, those measures stem from concerns over the movement of potential dissidents or criminal elements. In addition, the Government seeks to prevent migration to cities and towns from the countryside in order to reduce urban unemployment and associated social problems. Nigeriens wishing to travel abroad or emigrate must apply for exit visas which are usually granted routinely. The repatriation of Nigerien nationals is unrestricted. In early 1983, the Government willingly and efficiently repatriated approximately 55,000 Nigeriens who had been expelled from Nigeria. A small number of refugees from other countries have been accepted.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change their Government

Niger is ruled by an authoritarian military regime. Virtually all political power is concentrated in the hands of the President, General Seyni Kountche. He rules in the name of the Supreme Military Council, a small group of military officers most of whom participated in the 1974 coup which brought Kountche to power. Kountche rules by decree, makes all government appointments, and decides the pace of all political change. The military remains the source of Kountche's power, but the number of military officers in high positions has declined substantially in recent years, except in the case of Niger's seven departments, all but one of which have military governors. Government operations are conducted largely by civilian technocrats.

The capacity of the people to influence the Government is improving but is still very limited. There are no political parties. As an alternative to a party-based democracy, the Government began in 1979 to create a structure it calls the Development Society, a hierarchical network of councils at the village, subregional, regional, and national levels. The councils, all of which were in place by late 1983, contain at each level a mixture of elected and appointed members, but only at the village level are some of the members elected directly by the people. At the higher levels, members are elected by the members at the next lower level. The precise role of the Development Society councils has yet to be defined in practice. Theoretically, their role is to involve the people in economic and social development activities. But even then their role is strictly advisory, and the councils have no financial support from the Government. The national council has the additional task of writing a national charter which is expected to pave the way for the writing of a constitution. The charter, and eventually the Constitution, are expected to address the subject of the future role of the military and find a formula for more popular participation in government.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Niger is not an active participant in regional and international human rights organizations. Niger has not been the subject of resolutions, investigations, or other actions by human rights organizations. However, Amnesty International has expressed its concerns to the Government, and in its 1984 report, about long-term detentions without trial, ill-treatment of prisoners, and prison conditions. An International Red Cross official visited Niger in 1984, primarily to establish contact with government officials. Freedom House rates Niger "not free."

SOCIAL, ECONOMIC, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Niger is one of the world's poorest countries. Most of the current population of 6,284,000 lives at no more than a subsistence level. Fully 35 percent (1975 estimate) of the population lives below an absolute poverty level. Gross national product per capita was $306 in 1982. Other social indicators are also low. The adult literacy rate was 10 percent in 1980 (male 14 percent, female 6 percent). In 1978, the primary school enrollment ratio was 21 percent, with a large bias in favor of males (27 percent) compared to females (16 percent). Infant mortality is 137 deaths for 1,000 live births. Life expectancy is 46 years. On the average, Nigeriens receive 91 percent of daily nutritional requirements (1977 estimate). A 1975 estimate shows only 27 percent of the population has access to safe water (38 percent urban, 26 percent rural), but this figure is believed to have improved in recent years, thanks to a large-scale government well-drilling program.

Given these conditions, the Government has made economic development its top priority. The bulk of the funds derived from the uranium boom of the late 1970's have been channeled into projects in health, agriculture, and rural development. Foreign assistance has also largely gone to these sectors. Substantial progress had resulted from these efforts.

However, the current and future economic prospects for Niger are bleak. Uranium prices are not expected to recover, and Niger has no other easily exploitable source of wealth. A large foreign debt, contracted in the early eighties in a mistaken anticipation of continued high uranium prices, has proved difficult to repay, forcing Niger to reschedule its debt and adopt an IMF-supervised austerity program. To make matters worse, a devastating drought in 1984 has left thousands of Nigeriens with no private means of support.

Niger's social and cultural characteristics have mixed effects on human rights. The bulk of the population lives much as it has for centuries. The essentially traditional nature of society helps ensure that family and ethnic group ties remain strong and supportive, but traditional practices and attitudes on ethnicity, women, and education have some negative effects. Males have considerable advantages in terms of education, employment, and property rights. In case of divorce, custody of all children under eight years of age is given to the husband. Conscious of this situation, the Government has made progress in improving the status of women by launching work on a new family code, by making better employment opportunities available to women, by giving them a significant role in the Development Society, and by supporting the National Women's Association.

Four major ethnic groups, each with its own language, make up the bulk of the population. The two nomadic groups, Tuaregs and Peuls, have somewhat less access to government services, primarily because their nomadic life makes it difficult for the Government to supply them with social services such as education and health. In addition, some Tuaregs and Peuls remain unconvinced of the value of any formal education and keep their children from attending schools. The drought-prone Nigerien climate has a particularly harsh effect on nomads. In bad years, such as 1984, it can heighten traditional animosities between the nomads and the Government. Signs have appeared this year that such animosity has contributed to a slowness on the part of the Government to provide a fair share of relief assistance to the nomads.

NIGERIA

In 1984 Nigeria was governed by a group of senior military officers, led by Major General Muhammadu Buhari, who seized power on December 31, 1983, from an elected civilian government. The officers cited economic mismanagement, corruption, and abuse of office by the civilian government as the rationale for the almost bloodless coup.

The military Government suspended portions of the 1979 Constitution, most significantly those guaranteeing such features of democratic process as free elections and the operation of political parties, as well as some provisions guaranteeing fundamental individual rights. The Government promulgated decrees which eroded the protections against such actions as arbitrary arrest and search without warrant. The Government also promulgated a decree which inhibits press freedom. Under the provisions of certain decrees, civilians have been tried by military tribunals.

The highest authority of the Government is the Supreme Military Council, 16 of whose 19 members are military officers. A federal cabinet, which includes military and civilian ministers in almost equal numbers, presides over the executive departments. At the state level, military governors are assisted by executive councils comprised of military and police officers and some civilian commissioners. At the federal and state levels, legislation is promulgated by decree and edict. All decrees and edicts of the military Government are exempted from challenge in any court of law. The judiciary remains intact, but its authority has been limited by the establishment of special military tribunals to try crimes defined by provisions of certain decrees. The Government has the resources of the security apparatus--the Nigerian Security Organization, the police force, and the military services--to maintain and enforce its rule.

Nigeria has a mixed economy. The Government plays a major role in important sectors and guides the economy, but there is a strong market orientation and broad scope for private investment. Private property rights are generally respected. There are indigenization laws which reserve some business areas for Nigerians and require foreign firms to maintain specified levels of Nigerian participation.

Differences of ethnicity and religion among Nigeria's large and exceptionally diverse population have affected the pattern of discrimination. In spite of government efforts to eliminate sex-based discrimination, women are subject to a number of discriminatory legal provisions, suffer unequal treatment in employment, and are considered socially inferior. At the same time, women play a key role in local economic affairs, exert influence through women's councils, and have an impact on society in education, culture, and youth affairs.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There is no evidence of killings for political motives. No former office holder or politician ousted by the military Government and tried by military tribunals has received the death penalty. However, a number of people were killed in February's religious disturbances in Yola when the army used artillery against areas occupied by rioters. Estimates of casualties vary from 500 to 1800. Nigeria is currently free of local terrorist or insurgent groups which use murder as a form of political action.

b. Disappearance

There are no known instances of politically motivated or government instigated disappearances in Nigeria during 1984. The Government has been suspected of complicity in the attempted kidnapping of a former Nigerian official in London in July but has denied involvement. The trial in London of a Nigerian and three Israelis arrested in the kidnapping attempt was pending at the end of 1984.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

A portion of the Constitution still in effect outlaws torture and the mistreatment of prisoners. Nigerian law provides that such excesses may be dealt with in criminal or civil proceedings. No reports of torture have come to light. There are reports of crowded and austere prison conditions and mistreatment, including police brutality. Under the terms of one of its decrees, the Government has extended the death penalty to a number of crimes including arson, tampering with oil pipelines or electric or telephone cables, illegal import or export of mineral ore, dealing in drugs, illegally dealing in petroleum products, counterfeiting, and armed robbery even when no death or injury occurs. Special tribunals have imposed the death sentence on individuals convicted for drug- and petroleum-related offenses. At year's end, these sentences were awaiting final confirmation by the Supreme Military Council. Another punishment which many consider excessive is 21-year imprisonment for cheating on examinations, tampering with mail, and forgery of checks. The Government has justified these punishments as necessary to restore order and discipline in the society. More than 100 persons have been publicly executed by firing squad for armed robbery.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The State Security (Detention of Persons) Decree issued by the Government allows the Chief of Staff, Supreme Headquarters, to detain persons suspected of acts prejudicial to state security or harmful to the economic well-being of the country. The Chief of Staff is required to review the case of each person detained under this decree every three months, to determine whether the detention should be terminated or extended. There is no evidence that this requirement is being met. No legal proceedings may be brought against any official for acting in pursuance of this decree. The Government also suspended some constitutional protections against arbitrary arrest and detention, including the right of habeas corpus, the requirement that the detained be informed in writing of the grounds for arrest or detention within 24 hours, and the requirement for compensation and an apology for unlawful arrest or detention. In one case, an American citizen was held for approximately three months before consular access was granted and for approximately nine months before charges were filed.

NIGERIA

As many as 5,000 politicians and office holders in the ousted government--at the federal, state, and local levels--were ordered to surrender to the police in January for interrogation regarding alleged corruption and abuse of office. Most did so, but a few fled the country. No one was exiled. Most of those who reported to the authorities were admonished not to travel outside their home states. Others were held under house arrest, and about 500 were imprisoned. In October, 250 of these detainees were released after investigations failed to incriminate them. Among the many persons still detained are the former President, Vice President, and Foreign Minister, against whom no charges have been brought. Some detainees' bank accounts were frozen, passports confiscated, houses searched, and documents and currency seized. Arrests and detentions were covered extensively by the press. The detainees were originally permitted visits by family members, but after two or three weeks were held incommunicado.

The military Government does not use forced labor as a means of political coercion or as a sanction against free expression of political opinions.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Special military tribunals have been set up to try persons suspected of corrupt practices or otherwise contributing to the country's economic adversity. Tribunals on corruption are chaired by military officers, with a justice of a federal or state high court as legal adviser. Tribunals established to try other crimes, such as currency violations, accusations against public officials, arson, import and export of certain goods, destruction of public property, and use or possession of drugs, are chaired by justices of the federal or state high courts, but include military and police officers. The investigating police officer may not serve on the tribunal. All tribunal verdicts are subject to review by the Supreme Military Council, which may confirm, overturn, or reduce the penalties. No appeal or other court challenge to the Supreme Military Council's final decision is allowed.

Trials before special military tribunals have commenced, and some convictions have been handed down. Former office holders convicted on charges of corruption include several state governors, one federal minister, and the Director of the Nigerian Youth Service Corps. Most received 21-year sentences, but some sentences were subsequently reduced.

The Nigerian Bar Association has urged its members to boycott corruption trials because of the presence on the tribunals of members without legal training, the requirement that the corruption trials be held in camera, and the absence of a right of appeal. However, some lawyers have ignored the Bar Association's position and represented the accused. Generally accepted procedural norms appear to be followed by the tribunals. The Government has justified the secrecy of the trials as being in the best interest of the accused because of the likelihood that the press would distort the proceedings. It has privately justified the creation of special military tribunals on the grounds that judicial independence was compromised under the civilian government and the judiciary implicated in election rigging.

Persons charged with crimes not covered by the decrees are tried in civilian courts, which were left intact by the Government's constitution modification decree. The Constitution guarantees a fair public trial in the civilian courts within three months from the date of arrest, though individuals have been held without charge for longer periods. The Constitution also guarantees notification of charges and access to legal counsel. These trials are public and adhere to constitutionally guaranteed individual rights. The Government has assured the judiciary of independence from the executive branch. In capital cases, the Government provides counsel for indigent defendants. In other cases, indigents must rely for counsel on the Nigerian Legal Aid Society, which has limited resources.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Nigerian society is generally free of arbitrary interference by the state in the private lives of citizens. The Constitution modification decree issued by the Government left in force the guaranteed rights to privacy in homes, correspondence, and oral electronic communication.

General surveillance of the population by the state is not practiced in Nigeria. There is no compulsory membership in political organizations, and there is no political enforcement of social, cultural, or religious codes. There has been no forced resettlement of population. Forced entry into homes is not generally permitted without the authorization of the judiciary. However, the Government's decree dissolving political parties authorizes any member of the police force or military to enter any building if there is reason to believe that a political meeting is taking place. The police and members of the Nigerian Security Organization have occasionally entered homes and offices without warrant when seeking evidence of corruption.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

While the constitution modification decree left intact the provisions of the 1979 Constitution guaranteeing freedom of expression and the press, the Federal Military Government did issue a decree in March which has tended to inhibit full expression of opinion. The decree makes it an offense for any person to "publish in any form, whether written or otherwise" a statement, rumor, message, or report which is false or which "is calculated to bring the Federal Military Government or the government of a state or a public officer to ridicule or disrepute." Three journalists, all from privately owned newspapers, have been convicted under the provisions of this decree. Two of them received one-year prison sentences for writing an article on ambassadorial appointments which the Government said was false. The third was imprisoned and later released for publishing a letter to the editor which a state governor said embarrassed him. A prominent educator and social critic has been held without charge since March. The press decree has restricted investigative reporting and diminished reportorial initiative. Moreover, high government officials have publicly attacked the press, promising to "descend heavily" on those who publish material injurious to the nation. Some media representatives have been called in by the Nigerian Security Organization and advised against certain practices. Government officials, however, have asserted that the Government does not intend to gag the press. In fact, different viewpoints on issues are still aired, including criticism of government actions and policies, particularly in privately owned newspapers.

There is no direct government censorship of the media, but the federal and state governments exercise some control over semi-official media through appointments of board directors and top executives.

The print media include privately owned and state-owned publications. The Federal Government owns 100 percent of one large daily newspaper and 60 percent of another. Most state governments own a daily newspaper responsive to the military governor. There are several privately owned newspapers, with wide circulation. There are no restrictions on ownership of other forms of print media. The Constitution reserves the right to own and operate radio and television stations to the state and federal governments. There is no book censorship by the Government, but book publishers are subject to the same laws that govern the print media, including the decree on publishing material that subjects public officials to embarrassment.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Government has banned political parties and authorized the head of state to dissolve any other group which has objectives similar to a political party.

The Constitution's guarantees of freedom of peaceful assembly and association for non-political purposes are generally respected for most of the thousands of private organizations and associations, whether legally registered and incorporated or not. The Government has, however, specifically banned the National Association of Nigerian Students, and, in August, broke up a meeting of Association members, arresting ten.

Nigeria has 42 industrial unions affiliated with a single national labor center, the Nigeria Labor Congress, plus independent professional unions and senior staff associations. Membership of the Congress's affiliated unions has declined, in the face of deep employment cutbacks in the public and private sectors, from an estimated three million to perhaps one or two million. The Nigerian Labor Congress and its affiliated unions are independent of the federal, state, and local governments and have democratically elected leaders.

Additional industrial unions may be formed by applying to the Federal Government's registrar of trade unions for certification. Since the merger by law in 1978 of the country's previous national labor centers, any new union must become a member of the Nigeria Labor Congress and must therefore conform with the requirements of both the Federal Government and the Nigeria Labor Congress to avoid conflicts of jurisdiction with existing unions. Supplementary organizations are sometimes tolerated but are not recognized as trade unions. Since 1978, the Nigeria Labor Congress has been obliged to confine its formal international affiliations to the United Nations' International Labor Organization and the Organization of African Trade Union Unity. Many individual Nigerian unions, however, retain informal ties with either the Prague-based World Federation of Trade Unions or the Brussels-based International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. Industrial trade unions have the right to strike as long as they conform to laws governing strike notifications and the mediation/arbitration activities of the Government. The Government's commitment to honor unions' right to bargain collectively has come into question with an official Ministry of Labor suggestion to the Nigeria Labor Congress that its unions suspend collective bargaining negotiations for one year "to minimize the effects of the current economic position on industrial relations." Nigeria has ratified ILO Conventions 87 (Freedom of Association and Right to Organize) and 98 (Right to Organize and Collective Bargaining).

Nigerian trade and professional groups are guaranteed the right of association by the 1979 Constitution. They may gather peacefully at any time and may conduct their activities on a national basis and with international bodies as they please. They are required to register with the Ministry of Commerce and Industries.

c. Freedom of Religion

Constitutional provisions of freedom of religion, religious practice, and religious education are generally observed throughout the country. Places of worship are established freely. No restrictions are placed on numbers of clergy trained. Links with coreligionists in other countries are maintained. Religious travel, including the Hajj, is permitted and officially supported. Missionaries and foreign clergy are permitted to enter Nigeria but are not encouraged.

Nigeria's population is approximately one-half Muslim and more than one-third Christian, with the remainder having primary attachment to traditional beliefs. Interreligious marriages occur frequently. Polarization between Christianity and Islam most often occurs where a "religious difference" is associated with geographic or ethnic differences. Islam and Christianity compete for converts and influence throughout much of the country, especially in the belt of states between the predominantly Muslim north and the predominantly Christian south. There were no significant incidents between the two communities in 1984. Despite the religious dominance of Islam and Christianity, non-Muslim/non-Christian minority communities generally live throughout the country under peaceful conditions.

In 1982, the Government banned the Muslim Maitatsine sect after charging that the movement violated Nigeria's criminal laws. In February 1984, the Government used police and the army to quell a disturbance by the Maitatsine sect in Yola. The governments of the northern states have sought to restrict or license self-styled Muslim teachers or itinerant preachers who were believed to be propagating heterodox Islamic doctrines or practices. This is the only publicized case of the proscribing of a religious sect in Nigeria, but there are constitutional prohibitions against "secret societies," some of which have had traditional religious overtones.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Constitution entitles Nigerian citizens "to move freely throughout Nigeria and to reside in any part thereof." The same provision states that "no citizen of Nigeria shall be expelled from Nigeria or refused entry thereto or exit therefrom." In general, these provisions have been observed. However, in 1984, several former office holders and politicians were restricted to their home states during investigations into their assets and activities. Some of the persons detained and subsequently released are still not permitted to leave Nigeria and must report twice a month to the Nigerian Security Organization and once a month to an assets investigation panel. Police checks on streets and highways hinder but do not block travel. The Government has succeeded in reducing the frequency of bribes being demanded by policemen at internal check points.

The ease of foreign travel has been affected by stringent Government restrictions on the amount of Nigerian currency that may be converted for use outside the country and by the Government's policy of issuing new passports only to students or to persons going abroad for official business or emergency medical treatment. However, Nigerians continue to travel in large numbers, and many thousands are studying abroad. Exit visas are not required to leave the country.

No known penalties have been levied on Nigerians who have emigrated, settled abroad, or acquired another nationality. However, naturalization in another country is automatically expatriating under the provisions of the Constitution.

Nigerian law and practice permit temporary refuge and asylum in Nigeria for political refugees from other countries. Nigeria has granted temporary settlement to some and assimilated others. Nigeria supports and cooperates with the work of the local office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. However, it has, at times, periodically deported illegal immigrants to their countries of origin.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Nigeria is ruled by a military group which seized power on December 31, 1983, and established the Federal Military Government. The Government suspended constitutional provisions concerning elected government and banned all political parties. Leaders of the Government have said they consider military rule temporary, but believe it is too early to consider returning to civilian rule. The leaders of the Government, who are primarily officers of the military and police forces, are not limited to one ethnic, religious, or geographic group. There are no women in the federal ruling bodies. There are, however, women commissioners--heads of executive departments--in some state governments. The civil service, in which women are a minority, remains in existence.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Although the military rulers have abolished democratic government, Nigeria continues to be a relatively open society. Nonetheless, it has conducted many of its trials before military tribunals in camera. Amnesty International reported in July that it had repeatedly requested a visa for an observer of the tribunals, but had received no response from the Nigerian Government. Amnesty International also reported it had appealed to the Nigerian authorities for the immediate and unconditional release of individuals it had identified as "prisoners of conscience."

Within Nigerian society, a Human Rights Committee of the Nigerian Bar Association specifically concerns itself with monitoring the domestic situation. The Nigerian Bar Association has spoken out against the composition of some of the Government's military tribunals and has recommended that lawyers boycott them. The Government has not taken any action against the Association for this stand. As a measure of the Government's tolerance of such criticism, it accepted an invitation to address a Nigerian Bar Association conference to explain and defend its actions. Freedom House rates Nigeria "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

During the past year, Nigerians have had to adjust to reduced petroleum revenues, steep inflation, and a decline in economic activity. The most visible economic hardship in Nigeria is found in the urban slums. Nigeria is experiencing the classic developing country syndrome of rural-urban migration. Particularly affected has been the capital, Lagos, where the inadequate facilities for water, electricity, housing, and other services have been overwhelmed. Poor urban dwellers face high unemployment, squalid living conditions, rising costs, and serious crime. Although detailed statistics are not available on unemployment, thousands of workers in the public and private sectors have been laid off and many schools have closed. Some unemployed are beginning to return to their villages to resume farming.

The World Bank estimated Nigeria's population in 1984 to be 88 million. An estimate of 100 million is widely accepted in Nigeria. According to World Bank figures for 1984, Nigeria's rate of population growth is 3.4 percent, life expectancy at birth is 50.5 years, and infant mortality is 131.7 per 1,000 live births (a figure considered low by many rural medical workers and some international organizations). According to the World Bank, the primary school enrollment ratio in 1979 was 87.3 percent, more than double the figure of a decade earlier. Adult literacy was estimated by the World Bank in 1980 at 34 percent. There is virtually no starvation in Nigeria. Although a poor 1983 harvest affected food supplies into 1984 and economic difficulties created periodic shortages of imported foodstuffs, the people generally appear to have been adequately fed. According to the World Bank, the average Nigerian in 1977 received 97.8 percent of the daily nutritional requirements. Nevertheless, as in most developing countries where statistics are uncertain, the possibility of malnutrition cannot be dismissed. The World Bank in 1982 estimated per capita Gross National Product (GNP) in current dollars at $863. This figure has probably declined in the last two years. The per capita GNP figure can also be misleading, as oil exports account for most of the country's revenue, and a large part of the rural population is only marginally involved in Nigeria's cash economy.

The Federal Military Government has explicitly repudiated the former government's educational policies, stating that an excessive portion of Nigeria's resources had been devoted to education at the expense of other development goals. The policy of rapid expansion of educational facilities has been reversed. The 21 federal universities have been reduced to 16, and all private universities have been closed. Plans for additional state universities have been dropped. The number of polytechnical colleges has been reduced, and numerous secondary and primary schools have been closed or merged. The commitment to universal free education has been modified, with almost all states imposing some fees on secondary students. Federal subsidies for room and board have been abolished, resulting in cost increases of 300 to 500 percent for all students.

The status of women in Nigeria involves a complex of economic, legal, and social factors. Women are regarded as inferior to men in virtually all fields. Discrimination in employment is common. Benefits and services-- travel allowances for dependents, medical benefits and housing allowances, for example--are sometimes denied to women employees. There is no legal recourse to this discrimination because the principle of equal treatment is not enshrined in Nigerian law. Nevertheless, women are neither powerless nor without representation in government, business, the media, and education. Women have economic power and exert influence either through women's councils or through their family connections. Women in southern Nigeria are the principal managers of the market economy in the villages. Women have their greatest impact on society in education, culture, and youth affairs. Women faculty members are present in many university departments, and women fill many mid-level positions in federal and state ministries of education. There has been a dramatic increase in the number of women with university degrees and in the number who have become professionals, including teachers, lawyers, doctors, judges, senior civil servants, media figures, and business executives. There had not, however, been a commensurate increase in their presentation in the political field before the advent of military rule.

Women are subject to a number of discriminatory legal provisions which vary from state to state. Although a woman keeps and controls her own wealth after marriage, her husband is still head of the household. Husbands can, for example, prevent their wives from obtaining employment or passports in many states. A woman may be arrested for leaving her husband. Fathers have superior legal authority over children. For example, a woman cannot take her child out of the country without the father's consent, but a father does not require the consent of the mother. In many states, a widow is prohibited from inheriting her husband's property, which in the absence of children usually reverts to the husband's family. Property acquired jointly may be taken from the wife and passed to their children or the husband's family. Husbands are not legally responsible for wives' debts.

RWANDA

Rwanda is a one-party state. The present Government came to power in a non-violent coup in 1973 and has since been confirmed in office by two uncontested elections. Rwanda's President, Major General Juvenal Habyarimana, is also the founder of the single party, the National Revolutionary Movement for Development. Government policy is set by the President in consultation with the party's Central Committee and the Council of Ministers. Laws are adopted by the National Development Council (the legislature), which was established in 1982. In December 1983, President Habyarimana, the sole candidate, was reelected along with a new slate of deputies. Although all of the legislative candidates had to be approved by the party, the race was open to almost all who chose to run.

Rwanda's pre-independence traditional feudal society, dominated by the Tutsi ethnic group (10 percent of the population, according to the 1978 census), was transformed in 1959 by a revolution of the majority Hutu (89 percent of the population) into a society with a stronger emphasis on individual rights. An ethnic majority government confirmed these internal changes at independence in 1962. During the next decade, Hutu efforts to redress the social, economic, and educational imbalance led to division and corruption among Hutus and sporadic ethnic strife. This gave rise to the coup d'etat which brought President Habyarimana to power.

In 1984, a cabinet reshuffle brought into office a new Minister of Justice, one of whose tasks has been to implement the commitment to human rights enunciated by the President in his inaugural address on January 8. Measures included a general amnesty of several thousand "common law" prisoners, a tightening up of pre-charging detention regulations, removal of the security officers responsible for abuses in 1983, and a program of prison reform.

Most Rwandans are poor rural farmers. There is little industry, and imports are expensive because of high transportation costs. Nevertheless, Rwandan economic development has managed to keep pace with the country's 3.7 percent population growth rate. A new National Labor Organization was launched in 1984.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no reports of politically motivated killings or summary executions in Rwanda in 1984.

b. Disappearance

Unexplained disappearances have not occurred in recent years. Arrests are made openly, and all trials except those for national security cases are public.

RWANDA

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

While torture is not specifically proscribed by law, the Constitution states, "The human person is sacred: its inviolability is assured." Following the beating of three women in a hotel in late November 1983, the Government undertook an investigation, at the end of which they discharged the police officers responsible.

Corporal punishment is not permitted. Prisoners receive equal treatment but neglect, overcrowding, and inadequate guard training have rendered prison conditions generally poor. A new prison with better facilities has been opened near Kigali, which should help improve the situation. The new Minister of Justice has made the improvement of the prison system his first priority. All classes of prisoners may now have monthly visits by their families.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Except for suspects caught committing crimes, arrests normally occur with the service of a warrant following investigation. Except in rare cases where the defendant is not available, charges must be formally stated in the defendant's presence within five days of arrest. Failure to meet that provision is grounds for dismissal of the charges. Under preventive detention provisions, however, persons may be held for 30 days. At the end of that period, a judicial review is mandatory. If warranted, the detention can be prolonged indefinitely in 30-day periods. These provisions have not been invoked during the past year. Detainees may appeal their incarceration, and the appeal must be heard within 24 hours by a competent judicial authority. There have been no known exceptions to the legally mandated warrant procedures and no detentions for political offenses in 1984.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Although all defendants are constitutionally entitled to representation, a shortage of lawyers makes it difficult for the accused to prepare an adequate defense. Family and other non-professional counsel is permitted.

The judiciary is statutorily independent and expected to apply the penal code impartially, but the President names and dismisses magistrates. New laws in January 1982 strengthened somewhat the independence of the judiciary by improving the nominating process and more closely defining the exercise of judicial functions and the promotion and discipline of judicial personnel. Rwanda has three separate court systems to deal with criminal/civil, military, and state security cases. All but security cases may ultimately be appealed to the court of appeals. A separate state security court has original jurisdiction over treason and other national security charges. In previous years, some cases tried before this court have resulted in innocent verdicts.

Amnesty International adopted 24 prisoners of conscience in 1983. These prisoners had been arrested in 1980 and inter alia convicted of distributing tracts which criticized senior government officials. In 1984, 16 of these prisoners were released.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Rwandans are subject to some interference in their private lives, following practices inherited from the former monarchy which ruled the country for several hundred years. Police are normally required to have warrants before entering a private residence. Using the pretext of checking required documentation, police authorities can gain unwarranted entry into homes. A person can move out of his home commune only with the permission of the mayor of the commune into which he wishes to move; the Government can bar a person from specific employment, but not all employment; and people must carry identification cards. On the other hand, there is no evidence of the monitoring of private correspondence, and the receipt of foreign publications is permitted. There is no interference with the right to marry or have children as one chooses.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedoms of speech and press are guaranteed by law, but public criticism of the Government is conspicuously lacking. This is probably due as much to the tradition of respecting authority, which became engrained in the national character during the long history of the now defunct monarchy, as from fear of sanctions. Some members of the National Development Council have criticized government policies and practices from the floor of the Council. Candidates in the December 1983 legislative elections were prohibited from expressing private opinions or advocating policies at rallies, which are carefully focused by party officials upon party doctrine. No private campaigning was permitted.

Radio broadcasts, a daily press bulletin, and a weekly newspaper are produced by the Government. Two Catholic Church publications sometimes print muted criticism of political and economic conditions. Such criticism is tolerated and occasionally even encouraged by the Government. There is no record of any journalist having been arrested for what he has written. The Government has cautioned the press, however, to avoid what it regards as "harmful" criticism of leaders and maintains that the press should devote its efforts to "promoting development." Books and imported publications are not censored, and academic freedom is respected. Faculty members at universities can conduct research and draw conclusions as they see fit.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of assembly is limited. There have been no public meetings or demonstrations to express overt opposition to government policies. The Government permits private associations, but requires that they be registered and accorded legal recognition before they may function.

The Constitution guarantees the right to unionize and strike, and in August 1984 a labor confederation was formed. This confederation is organized under the guidance of the party, which must approve its choice of officers. All member unions of the confederation will have the right to strike, but only with the approval of the executive bureau of the confederation. In the meetings attendant on the confederation's creation, the responsibility of labor to contribute to the development of the nation and to transcend parochial interests of individual workers and trades were recurrent themes. Despite obvious limitations, the confederation will provide a voice for Rwanda labor which has not previously existed. In addition, the Government has permitted seminars on labor issues, organized by unofficial local labor bodies, which receive some support from foreign labor considerations and the International Labor Organization.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is protected constitutionally and respected in practice. The population is some 70 percent Christian and one percent Muslim, with the remainder following traditional or no religious practices. Eighty percent of the Christians belong to the Roman Catholic Church, but there are active Protestant denominations as well. The Government does not openly favor one religion over another, although the Catholic Archbishop of Kigali is a member of the party's Central Committee, and all but one or two members of the Council of Government are Catholic. The President and other Catholic government and party officials regularly attend special services of all denominations. The Government depends upon church-supported schools for a considerable portion of education in Rwanda (e.g., over 85 percent of secondary schools are church-supported).

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Freedom of residence within Rwanda is restricted by laws and regulations, which require people to hold national identity cards and residence and work permits. People who wish to spend more than three days in a commune other than their own are required to obtain permission from the communal authorities where they will be visiting. Property owners who do not require renters to show valid documentation are subject to fines and even imprisonment. "Clandestine" renters are subject to expulsion.

Foreign travel is closely controlled through the granting or refusal of passports, preceded by a security check of each applicant. As a result Rwandans often are denied permission to travel abroad, usually without formal explanation. In addition, a refundable deposit of about $400 is required for each passport issued for unofficial travel. This is ostensibly to cover the cost of any subsequent repatriation, but has the effect of discouraging travel and conserving foreign exchange.

Rwandans may emigrate provided they are properly documented. People who left Rwanda as refugees during the revolution or for other reasons may be repatriated on a case-by-case basis. It is also possible for them to return for short family visits, traveling on a "laissez-passer" from the country of refuge. Family members remaining in Rwanda may also obtain a "laissez-passer" from Rwanda for visits to neighboring countries, without having to go through all the formalities of a passport application. Rwanda's high population density and shortage of land greatly restrict prospects for repatriation and resettlement of refugees. Consequently, although Rwanda recognizes the citizenship claims of some of the over 30,000 refugees forced into the country from Uganda in October 1982, not all of these people have yet been able to leave refugee camps for permanent resettlement in Rwanda.

The refugee camps are well managed and food supplies are adequate. In June, troops fired on a group of refugees who were attempting to organize opposition to the appointment of a block captain. This incident appears to have been a one-time occurrence. The Government will not permit any significant economic activity which would give the camps an aspect of permanency, as long as there is a chance that the Ugandan Government will take some of the refugees back. In early 1983, the Governments of Rwanda and Uganda agreed on a procedure for the definitive settlement of the problem through the determination of citizenship. Although the interviews have been completed, and Rwanda has recognized the citizenship of more than 1,000 of the affected people, Uganda's final adjudication of the 27,000 persons claiming Ugandan citizenship is still pending. The Rwandan Government, the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, and other international donors cooperate in operating the camps.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Rwandans have no opportunity to change their government through a free choice of alternative legislative proposals and candidates from opposing parties for public office. The Constitution institutionalizes the Council of Ministers, the legislature, and above all, the power of the President and the party. All policy decisions and nominations of candidates for public office are made by the party, which is the "single political entity beyond which no political activity can be exercised." The party in turn is dominated by its President, who chooses the Secretary General and Central Committee and is the only constitutionally recognized candidate for President of the nation.

Every citizen is automatically a member of the party and theoretically must pay party dues on a sliding scale representing one to two days' pay per year. Delegates are elected and appointed to the governing national congress, which meets every five years, but the essential function of the congress is to endorse the program presented by the party leadership.

Elections for public office are contested only by candidates approved by the party. Elections provide an occasion to confirm rather than change the direction of government. Candidatures for the legislative seats of the National Development Council may be vetoed by the President.

The National Development Council has shown a keen interest in financial questions, suggested modifications to some proposed legislation, and developed specialized committees to facilitate its work, but it has not ventured to initiate legislation on its own. However, when a member of the legislature and former Minister of Social Affairs, Felicien Gatabazi, was accused in 1984 of misappropriation of refugee funds, the Council defeated a government motion to lift his parliamentary immunity. The action became moot at the end of the legislative session, when the immunity lapsed in any case, but the vote showed that some parliamentary freedom of action is possible.

Rwanda's 10 percent Tutsi minority, which dominated the country politically and socially before independence, has been relegated to a minor role in government, civil service, and military in proportion to its numerical representation in the population. Women as yet play a marginal role in political life. Nevertheless, 9 of 70 legislative deputies are women, and there is 1 woman among the 21 members of the party's Central Committee.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Rwanda participates in African and U.N. human rights activities and has made a concentrated effort in recent years to improve its human rights record. It hosted an international human rights colloquium in 1978, participated in an investigation of human rights in the Central African Republic in 1979, and helped draft the human rights convention of the Organization of African Unity in 1981. Representatives of the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) have made periodic visits to prisons, including Ruhengeri where the Lizinde conspiracy prisoners are held. (Theoneste Lizinde, the former head of the security police, allegedly led a plot in 1980 to overthrow the Government.) In its 1984 report, Amnesty International was concerned about 24 prisoners of conscience convicted in the 1980 conspiracy and other political prisoners who were allegedly subjected to deliberately harsh conditions of imprisonment. However, Amnesty International also noted some improvements in prison conditions during 1983 and that President Habyarimana had asked the Minister of Justice and the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Kigali to investigate allegations of harsh conditions of imprisonment. The results of the investigation were not published, but at least 16 of the Lizinde conspiracy prisoners were released in 1984. There were no reports of requests for outside investigations of alleged human rights violations in 1984. Freedom House terms Rwanda "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Rwanda is one of the world's poorest and most densely populated countries (6 million people and 3.7 percent annual growth in 1984). Adjusted gross national product (GNP) per capita has more than doubled since 1970, but still totaled only $261 in 1982. Some 95 percent of Rwandans earn their living from subsistence farms averaging less than 2 acres, and rural income distribution is relatively even. Urban dwellers are marginally more prosperous but suffer unemployment, with wages lagging behind moderate inflation. The right to own property alone or in association is protected. The creation of a National Population Office in 1981 and increasing family planning resources represent an awakening recognition of the need to curtail high population growth.

Rwanda's principal export crop is coffee, which accounts for about 70 percent of foreign exchange earnings and provides the bulk of government revenues. The country has little industry and must pay high transportation costs (which increased 40 percent in 1984) to move goods along a 1,100-mile road and railroad link to the sea via Uganda and Kenya. Real economic growth in recent years has stayed ahead of population growth, but prospects that it will continue to do so in the long term are dim. Rwanda's trade, investment, and banking policies encourage modest private sector economic activity. About 85 percent of Rwanda's small businessmen are Rwandans, and the proportion is growing. Foreign investment is stagnant.

Development goals and projects equally address all regions and population groups. Life expectancy has increased from 41 years in 1968 to about 47 years in 1984, while infant mortality has remained at a level of about 127 per 1,000 live births (1984). In 1977, Rwandans received about 97 percent of their caloric nutritional requirements, and 35 percent of the population had access to safe water in 1976. Adult literacy stood at 50 percent in 1980, and primary school enrollment as a percentage of primary school age children in the population expanded from 49 percent in 1960 to 87 percent in 1981.

The Constitution states, "All citizens are equal before the law, without any discrimination, notably that of race, color, origin, ethnicity, clan, sex, opinion, religion, or social position." However, the requirement that ethnic origin be listed on identity documents helps to insure that informal quotas corresponding to the Hutu/Tutsi ratio in society are not exceeded. Tutsis are employed in all economic sectors, but are better represented in private business than in government.

Women do most of the agricultural labor and have benefited less than men from social development. Despite the language in the Constitution, women's rights to property are limited, and they are not treated on the same basis as men in divorce proceedings. Moreover, women have fewer chances for education, employment, and promotion, often because the men in their lives (fathers, uncles, and husbands) prefer them to remain in uneducated traditional roles at home. Family planning services are still inadequate but are improving. There are virtually no day care services for women who have children but wish to work. There are few organizations promoting women's interests, and efforts to establish a national union of Rwandan women within the male-dominated political movement have been unsuccessful.

SAO TOME AND PRINCIPE*

Sao Tome and Principe has been a one-party state since gaining independence from Portugal in 1975. Effective political power is concentrated in the Presidency. The country is composed of two small islands off the West Coast of Africa with a population of about 100,000. At independence, the Movement for the Liberation of Sao Tome and Principe acceded to control of the Government, and Manuel Pinto Da Costa, leader of the political party, was chosen President without opposition by the Popular Assembly, constitutionally the supreme organ of state and highest legislative body. The party reconfirmed him for a second five-year term in 1980.

The Government draws heavily on Marxist-Leninist principles. State control of the means of production (mainly cacao plantations) is the general rule. In practice, freedoms of speech, press, and assembly are circumscribed, and no public expression of opposition to the Government is permitted. All news media are under government control.

All political opposition, whether through political parties or otherwise, is prohibited. Small opposition groups in exile in Portugal and Gabon have thus far shown no evidence of being able to influence events on the Islands. There is no known organized political opposition in Sao Tome itself. The small Sao Tomean army is reinforced by troops from Angola. There are a few Soviet and Cuban military advisors.

The economy of Sao Tome has encountered serious problems in recent years due to the steady decline in cacao exports. This reflects both lower world prices for cacao and serious management problems on the nationalized plantations. The situation became particularly acute in 1983 when poor rains further reduced both cacao and food crops, resulting in serious food shortages. Considerable food assistance from the United States and other Western countries delivered in 1984 has largely solved the immediate problem, but food shortages are expected to recur.

There was no known change in the overall human rights situation in 1984.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from

a. Political Killing

There were no reports of political killings in 1984.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of abductions or secret political arrests in 1984.

---

*There is no American Embassy in Sao Tome. Information on the human rights situation is therefore limited.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

No reports of such abuses were received in 1984.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

There have been reports that at least eight Sao Tomeans were arrested early in 1984 and detained without trial because of public criticism of the Government. These include individuals detained for expressing open dissatisfaction with the Government's handling of the food situation. The reported arrival of anti-government tracts in Sao Tome in late 1984 led to the cancellation of a number of exit permits and possible imprisonment of those held responsible. Otherwise, there have been no reports of groups of people being detained since late 1982 on the Island of Principe. An estimated 100 people may have been imprisoned without trial.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution does not address the right of public trial, although there have been instances of public trials of individuals accused of common crimes in recent years. Criminal trials are occasionally reported by the local media. To date the only political prisoners who were given trials were those accused of coup-plotting in 1977. In those trials and in criminal trials since that time, the accused were assigned counsel by the Government. There is no tradition of independent defense counselors; common criminals are given a hearing and sentenced by a judge.

f. Arbitrary Interference With Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Because of Sao Tome's geographic isolation and small population, the Government does not have a highly intrusive security system to detect opposition opinion. However, the Government's loosely organized system of informers and monitoring of individual participation in the activities of the Country's sole legal political party insure that potential dissidents are identified.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The security services are alert and quickly react to public expressions of opposition or dissatisfaction with the Government. The only Sao Tomean media are organs of the Government, consisting of one television station which broadcasts two days per week, a radio station which carries music, government-prepared news releases, and instructional programs, and a weekly two-to-four page newspaper of government-prepared news releases. There are no foreign wire service items other than occasional items from Soviet and Angolan sources. Sao Tome radio also uses Voice of America taped music programs. No public written or oral criticism of the Government is tolerated.

SAO TOME AND PRINCIPE

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Political assembly and activity are legal only within the country's sole political party, the Movement for the Liberation of Sao Tome and Principe. The party exists to encourage popular support for the Government. The sole trade union confederation is affiliated with the party, and workers are prohibited from striking. The union confederation participates in the International Labor Organization and is affiliated to the Organization of African Trade Union Treaty. Virtually all economic activity takes place within the constraints of the government-run economy. Cultural and social organizations are reported to require government approval, which is believed to be easily obtained.

c. Freedom of Religion

This right is included in the national Constitution. The three religious communities on Sao Tome -- Roman Catholic, Evangelical Protestant, and Seventh-Day Adventist -- are allowed to practice freely. The Government provides some funding for a school and social services center managed by the Catholic church.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The geographic isolation and poverty of the country severely limit foreign travel and emigration. The Government closely controls exit visas for the few people who do travel. Anti-government tracts which appeared in Sao Tome late in 1984 led to the confiscation of a number of exit permits and reported imprisonment of those suspected to be responsible for the leaflets. Almost all trips are for governmental missions or medical evacuations. Domestic travel is not controlled by the Government, but the lack of reliable and affordable air service between the islands limits travel.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Government policy is determined by President Da Costa, in consultation with his key cabinet and security officials. The leadership uses the single political party to consolidate its rule at the local levels, and to assist in selecting candidates for the Popular Assembly. In the circumstances, the citizens have little opportunity to change the Government or to influence its actions. In 1983 there was one "assemblea," a series of mass meetings lasting several days, to encourage popular support for the Government. There were no elections held in 1984. No public expression of opposition to the Government is permitted. There are small exile groups in Portugal and Gabon. Internal security is reinforced by Angolan troops and Soviet and Cuban military advisors.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

In its 1984 report, Amnesty International expressed concern about certain individual Sao Tomeans detained for alleged political activity. Several individuals cited by Amnesty International have been released, including Albertino Neto, the former chief of the armed forces, who was imprisoned from 1977 until July 1983, when he was one of nine detainees who were given amnesty. However, the extent to which the Government is cognizant of or influenced by international human rights organizations is not known. Freedom House rates Sao Tome "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The Sao Tome economy has been based on plantation agriculture, particularly cacao, since the 1800's. At independence, the Portuguese-owned plantations, which occupied 90 percent of the arable land, were taken over by the Government and since then have been operated as state-owned enterprises. The country has encountered major economic problems in recent years due to the steady decline in both the value and volume of cacao exports, which represent 90 percent of total exports. This trend has resulted from a combination of declining world cacao prices and mismanagement of the state-owned plantations. Cacao production, which had reached 10,000 tons in 1975, is believed to have been about 4,000 tons in 1983. The country is dependent on imported foodstuffs, and the lack of foreign exchange in recent years has caused shortages of many staple foods and other consumer products. The situation became particularly acute in 1983 when poor rains intensified the long-term problems. Severe shortages of both imported staple foods and fruits were reported in 1983. Malnutrition was emerging as a problem but, with large amounts of international food assistance sent to Sao Tome in 1984, this now appears to be under control.

The country's per capita gross domestic product, which has been estimated as high as $450 in the late 1970's, declined to $365 in 1982 and is believed to have dropped to about $260 in 1983 as a result of the steady deterioration of the economy. The Government has made a major effort to improve social and educational services. Literacy is about 50 percent and an estimated one-third of the student-age children are in school. Infant mortality statistics were reported as 63 per 1,000 births in 1984, Life expectancy at birth for 1984 was 65.6 years. The Government states that it provides free basic medical care and medicine to all citizens but reliable statistics to support the Government's contention are not available. There have been no indications of discrimination by sex or religion in the allocation of economic or social benefits under government programs in Sao Tome & Principe.

Women have constitutional guarantees of equality, and several were active in public life. One senior official, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, is a woman. Cultural factors, rather than legal or political restraints, limit the actual participation of women in the government. The Sao Tome population is relatively homogeneous, and there have been no reports of a policy discrimination on a tribal or regional basis among Sao Tomean citizens. As energetic outsiders, Cape Verdeans in Sao Tome do suffer some informal discrimination. Members of the Islands' small educated class appear to enjoy advantages in government employment possibilities.

SENEGAL

Senegal, which attained independence from French colonial rule in 1960, is a republic with a democratically elected President and a unicameral Parliament. Abdou Diouf acceded to the Presidency when former President Leopold Senghor retired in January 1981; Diouf was elected in his own right in freely contested elections in February 1983. A new Parliament was elected at the same time; the Socialist Party, of which President Diouf is Secretary General, won 111 of the 120 seats. While the Senegalese Government defines the country's economy as socialist--and the Socialist Party is a member of the Socialist International--the private sector plays an important role. Private sector participation in agriculture, on which the Senegalese economy is based, is being encouraged.

Senegal has longstanding democratic traditions which predate independence, and there is wide public interest in, and debate on, political matters. The post-independence political scene has been dominated by the Socialist Party, but Senegal is a multi-party state and has 15 legal political parties.

The Senegalese military has a reputation as an apolitical and professional organization, respected by the population. The civilian security forces are also generally well trained and disciplined and respect the laws which they enforce. The legal system is active and effective in protecting human rights.

Long- and short-term trends, in the human rights context, remain positive. Some concern raised by opposition party leaders about the fairness of present electoral laws colored the campaign leading into the November 1984 municipal and rural elections, but the opposition admits that the original intent of these laws was to broaden the base of the electorate and remove unreasonable restrictions. Two continuing tendencies which remain potentially worrisome for their effect on the human rights climate are the growth of Islamic fundamentalism and the increase in the crime rate. However, there were no credible reports of human rights violations in 1984. The Government, which has a designated senior official at the Presidency to follow human rights matters, has encouraged the work of Dakar-based human rights organizations in organizing conferences and other human rights activities in Africa. The Government of Senegal has given official sanction and the promise of some material support to the holding of a second World Congress on Human Rights in Dakar in June-July 1985.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There is no evidence of any instances of killings at government instigation or for political motives.

b. Disappearance

There have been no reports of abduction of individuals by official, quasi-official, opposition, or vigilante groups.

SENEGAL

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Government officials in Senegal generally respect the constitutional provision that the person is sacred and will be protected by the state, and they adhere also to the section of the criminal code prohibiting physical abuse. There have been, however, reported instances of the use of force by lower level police officials in the interrogation of suspected criminals. Prison conditions are characterized by overcrowding and sparse victualing--direct results of Senegal's serious economic difficulties. Harsh prison conditions are to some extent alleviated by the access to prisoners by clerics, friends, and families who are permitted to provide amenities.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The constitutional prohibition against arbitrary arrest or detention is respected in practice. Persons are not detained, punished, or tried for the expression of views critical or different from those of the Government. The Senegalese legal system is patterned after the French one and does not include habeas corpus. A person suspected of a crime may legally be held without charge for 48 hours after arrest, or up to 72 hours if ordered by a public prosecutor. The limitations of this provision of law are respected, and charges are formally and clearly drawn. Preventive detention is permitted when civil authorities determine that there is a threat of civil disturbance or the person is a danger to himself or others. Some opposition party charges of abuse of the preventive detention provisions of the law were leveled following the December 1983 violent riots in Ziguinchor, the provincial capital of the Casamance. The opposition charged that some detainees, ultimately found to be innocent, were held for several months. The Government held that the violence was so serious and involved so many arrests that the legal processes may have taken longer than usual, but were strictly observed. By law every citizen has access to legal counsel of his choice in every aspect of legal procedure. In practice, persons with means will have private legal counsel, and the law makes provision for public defenders for those without means.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Senegal follows the French legal system. It has an active, independent, and well-trained judiciary. The judiciary is constitutionally independent of the executive, the legislature, and the military. Court officials are trained lawyers who have completed a number of years of required apprenticeship. Trials are open to the public, and defendants have the right to a defense counsel, many of whom are often very skilled and aggressive in the protection of their clients. Ordinary courts hold hearings which are presided over by a panel of judges and, in the case of criminal charges, include a jury. There are three other categories of courts: the High Court of Justice, the Security ("political") Court, and the military courts.

The High Court of Justice was created for the sole purpose of trying high government officials for treason or for malfeasance. This court has not been convened since the early 1970's. The Security (or "political") Court consists of a judge and two assessors. It has jurisdiction over cases referred to it by the Government when it is suspected that a crime has been committed for a political motive. The Court was activated following December 1982 demonstrations and riots in the Casamance provincial capital of Ziguinchor. The demonstrators' goal was the secession of the Casamance, and foreign instigation was a suspected factor. In December 1983, even more violent riots occurred, and over 100 arrests were made in Ziguinchor and the surrounding area. The security court released a large number of the arrestees on bail, or put them on probation, after both sets of incidents. Sentences passed on those judged guilty consisted of jail terms ranging from a few months to several years.

The military court system has jurisdiction over offenses committed by members of the armed forces during peacetime (in wartime, courts martial could be convened). Civilians may not be tried by military courts.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Senegalese Government bureaucracy, patterned after the French system, is highly centralized and requires of Senegalese citizens a fairly extensive amount of documentation for purposes of education, obtaining social security benefits, etc. The intent, however, is not coercive and there is otherwise little governmental interference in the private lives of Senegalese citizens. There is no coercion to join a particular political party or to participate in political demonstrations. A wide variety of political expression is evident and not subject to government restrictions other than those relating to public order. There is no evident pattern of monitoring the private written or oral correspondence of Senegalese citizens. In the past, foreign publications containing materials considered slanderous to Senegalese officials have not been permitted to be sold, but there have been no reported instances of such bans since 1979. There are constitutional and legal safeguards against arbitrary invasion of the home which are considered inviolable. Search warrants are required and may be issued only by judges and in accordance with procedures established by law. There is no evidence that public security forces do not respect the law in this regard.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Senegal enjoys freedom of speech and press in theory and in practice. The Constitution guarantees the right of each individual to express and disseminate his opinions freely. There are several regularly published newspapers and magazines and a number of publications which appear sporadically, reflecting a broad range of opinion from religious-conservative to Marxist-Leninist. The country's most professional and informative newspaper is controlled by the majority Socialist Party and therefore tends to support government policies. Articles critical of government policies and officials, however, regularly appear even in this newspaper. Other publications are sometimes vociferously critical of the Government. Academic freedom is enjoyed without hindrance by the schools and the country's sole university.

Television and radio stations are owned by the Government; thus the Government can control what is broadcast. However, coverage is given to the activities of opposition political parties.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Senegalese freely and frequently exercise their constitutional right to assembly. Demonstrations or protest meetings against government policies are closely monitored by the security services to ensure that public order is not unreasonably disturbed. In late September 1984, the first known instance in recent years of government refusal to permit an assemblage by opposition political parties occurred in Dakar. A meeting called by seven extreme leftist parties to protest price rises on certain consumables was initially approved by the Government, but later cancelled. The Government's action was legal, and the potential for disturbances existed, but it was highly unusual.

Both the major trade union confederation, which is a governmental organization, and the small independent trade unions play an important role in the society and economy of Senegal. Trade unions are free to organize, negotiate, and strike; less than 25 percent of the labor force is organized. The trade union confederation is entitled, by law, to two ministerial posts, but no longer accepts these positions because of potential conflict of interest. In the past, the Government has used its connection with the confederation as a useful means of informing workers of government policies, gaining better understanding of worker grievances, and ensuring that strikes are legal and staged for significant reasons. Severe infighting between two rival factions of the confederation in 1984 did some damage to its relations with the Government and to the confederation's effectiveness with its membership. The smaller independent trade unions function freely without a direct government link. Union activity in Senegal has been mainly focused on economic and work-related issues.

Economic concerns intensified in 1984 as wages remained relatively stagnant while prices continued to rise. The International Labor Organization maintains a regional office in Senegal.

c. Freedom of Religion

Senegal is constitutionally a secular state, and freedom of religion is a legal right which exists in fact. Islam is the religion of upwards of 85 percent of the population. Other religions, primarily Catholicism, are freely practiced. Missionary activity is permitted, and foreign Protestant missionaries are active in several regions of the country. Conversion is permitted; there is no discrimination against minority religions; and adherence to a particular religion confers neither advantage nor disadvantage in civil, political, economic, military, or other secular status.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Senegalese Constitution states that all citizens of the republic have the right to move and establish themselves freely anywhere in Senegal, a right that is respected in practice. In 1981, the Government abolished a requirement for exit visas to travel outside Senegal. There is no restriction on emigration, or sanctions, official or otherwise, against intending emigrants. Repatriates are not officially disadvantaged on return to Senegal. The U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) regional office in Dakar recognizes and assists about 5,000 persons as refugees. There have been no known cases of refugees being forced to return to countries from which they have fled or in which they fear persecution. Senegal is also host to 500,000-600,000 persons from Guinea and Guinea-Bissau, few of whom are recognized as refugees partly because of Senegal's desire to maintain good relations with its neighbors. UNHCR officials believe that many of the Guinean residents plan to return to Guinea since the change of regime there in 1984.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Senegal is a functioning multi-party democracy. There are currently 15 legally registered political parties, ranging from conservative to Marxist and Trotskyite. Presidential and parliamentary elections were last held in February 1983, and rural and municipal elections were held in late November 1984. While there is a long tradition of democracy in Senegal, political life has been dominated by the Socialist Party throughout the post-independence period. This party won by a large majority in the 1983 elections amid some complaints by opposition parties of voting irregularities. While the consensus was that the elections were on the whole free and fair, the largest opposition party maintains that the lack of stricter controls on identification of voters and over voting sites made some of the results questionable.

Senegal has universal suffrage. Women are active participants in the political process, and several parties, including the dominant Socialist Party, have sections promoting women's rights. There are 12 women deputies in the National Assembly and 4 women in President Diouf's cabinet.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Senegal is a leader among African countries in the establishment and promotion of international standards for human rights practices. It was the original sponsor of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) Human Rights Charter. Senegal is also an active member of the Human Rights Commission. Dakar is the headquarters of the African Bar Association's Institute of Human Rights, an organization which trains lawyers and judges in translating general human rights principles into practical judicial/legal procedures. Senegal hopes to host a second World Congress on Human Rights in Dakar in 1985. The preparatory committee is headed by a prominent Senegalese lawyer. Senegal has not been the subject of human rights investigations by outside organizations. Amnesty International did not include Senegal in its 1984 report. Freedom House rates Senegal "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

During the past few years, Senegal has suffered significant economic reverses. The quality of life has been affected by poor performance in the agricultural sector, which provides a livelihood for over 80 percent of Senegal's population, and a steady decline in the local currency's dollar value has directly affected the economy, despite only modest trade linkages with the U.S. Approximately 40 percent of Senegal's foreign debt and all of its oil and gas purchases are denominated in dollars. Payments on external debt and the energy import bill consume almost the entire amount of foreign currency earnings accumulated annually.

In 1983, drought severely reduced yields of groundnuts (peanuts), Senegal's traditional major cash crop and foreign currency earner. Drought cut back subsistence crop production as well. In 1984, rains were inadequate in many regions of Senegal, and agricultural production was again low. The effects of the second bad harvest in two consecutive years are deeply felt by all Senegalese. Senegal's economic production also lags because of long-term deficiencies in the Government's agricultural policies, including its commodity pricing policy and a reliance on inefficient and ineffective state-owned rural development agencies. If population continues to grow at the annual rate of 3.2 percent (1984) and agricultural production stagnates or falls, the quality of life in Senegal will continue to deteriorate despite the heavy influx of foreign food aid assistance.

An increase in crime resulting from depressed economic conditions could eventually degrade the climate of security based on respect for the law in which human rights have flourished in Senegal.

Due to heavy public sector needs, credit facilities for the private sector are severely limited. After repeated rescheduling of foreign government and commercial debt, international sources of credit have also dried up. The Senegalese Government has remained solvent since 1980 through assistance from bilateral donors and the International Monetary Fund (IMF), and through debt rescheduling.

The Government introduced austerity measures in August 1983, putting a halt to unrestrained budget increases, restricting credit, capping the growth of public sector employment, and reducing government agriculture sector subsidies and principal consumer commodity subsidies. Significant price increases for sugar, cooking oils, rice, and petroleum products occurred in 1983. Cooking oil prices were increased again in 1984, this time by 50 percent, and petroleum prices rose. Following intensive negotiations with the IMF and a further increase in the price of rice, a new standby agreement became effective in January 1985. The belt-tightening measures are having a direct impact on the population at large, and have placed strains on the institutions which have enabled the Senegalese to enjoy broad exercise of their human rights. On the other hand, Senegal's economic progress in the two decades since independence has been sufficiently continuous to provide a certain assurance of stability within the country.

World Bank statistics indicate Senegal provided 95 percent of the FAO-established minimum caloric requirement per capita in 1977. The per capita GNP reached $486 in 1982. Senegal has a road and transportation network capable of quickly distributing imported food supplies in times of acute local shortage. Health conditions have also improved over the past decade. Over a third of Senegal's population now has access to safe water. The number of physicians and nursing personnel per 100,000 population has doubled since 1960. Infant mortality has declined from 159 deaths per 1,000 in the first year of life in 1972 to 103 per 1,000 in 1984. Life expectancy at birth has risen from an estimated 40 years in 1969 to 45 years in 1984. Due to reduced mortality rates and improvements in water supply systems and health care services, the population is increasing at a rapid pace, growing by an estimated 3.2 percent annual rate in 1984 to a total of over 6.5 million people. This rapid growth poses a severe problem for already overloaded public services as surplus population migrates to the urban centers.

The Government is continuing its efforts to increase enrollment in primary and secondary schools and find employment for school graduates. Almost 58 percent of primary school-aged males and 38 percent of females in the same age group are presently enrolled in primary education, and approximately 12 percent of secondary school-aged minors attend school. Adult illiteracy remains high, however, especially in the rural areas.

Traditional values, both societal and religious (chiefly Islamic), have limited women's access to certain types of employment and higher education, thus inhibiting them from obtaining greater prominence in political life. There are, however, no legal hindrances to advancement for women and they are present in respectable numbers in the government and private sectors. Women are prominent among Senegal's intellectual elite, including several professors at the University of Dakar. A number of government ministries employ women in key positions such as the Political Director of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs; several key agronomists, statisticians, and economists in other ministries are women. Senegal also has several active organizations promoting women's rights, including the Federation of Women's Associations which held a two-week conference in March 1984. The Federation has ties to a number of women's groups in Africa and, since 1979, has been a sister organization of the National Council of Negro Women in the United States.

SEYCHELLES

The Government of Seychelles, led by President France Albert Rene, took power in June 1977 in a military coup d'etat. The 1979 Constitution abolished all political opposition to the socialist ruling party, the Seychelles Peoples' Progressive Front. This Constitution does not guarantee fundamental human rights but states them in a preamble as the intention of the people of Seychelles.

The Government has faced security threats in the past from its opponents living in Australia, the United Kingdom, and South Africa. Government forces repulsed a group of mercenaries who attacked Seychelles in November 1981. An internal mutiny by some members of the armed forces in 1982 was also put down with the assistance of Tanzanian troops then in Seychelles. In 1984 all Tanzanian troops were removed by mutual agreement, but there are an estimated 100 North Korean military advisors stationed in Seychelles.

The Seychelles economy has, until recently, been almost totally reliant on tourism for foreign exchange. An estimated 65,000 foreigners visited in 1984. Seychelles has actively sought to diversify its economy by granting fishing licenses to French, Spanish, Korean, and Japanese interests. The Government has sought donor assistance to move ahead with a major expansion of the fishing port in Victoria.

The President was elected without opposition to a new term of office in 1984, and he further consolidated power within the single ruling party. Responding to charges both at home and abroad that he was bent on creating a Communist state, the President reiterated his desire that Seychelles maintain a non-aligned foreign policy, and he reaffirmed his commitment to freedom of religion. This year, some 38 persons were charged with unlawful assembly when they sought to demonstrate against the Soviet presence in the country. Their cases have not been resolved although all have been freed on bail. More disturbing was the disappearance of a known dissident in September 1984. Although his whereabouts remain unknown, many believe that his disappearance may have been arranged by persons in the security forces.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no reported instances of killing for political motives or other instances of arbitrary deprivation of life in 1984.

b. Disappearance

The unexplained disappearance of two Seychellois in 1984 has raised serious concern among many elements of the population. In the first instance there is no evidence that the man was involved in political activities. The second, however, was believed by the Government to have been a member of the outlawed opposition movement. His disappearance in September is still under investigation. Many of the Government's opponents, as well as key church leaders, have pressed for more information on this case.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution explicitly forbids torture and there have not been any reports that torture has been utilized. There have been some isolated reports of rough treatment by police in the course of criminal arrests. Demonstrators arrested by the Government in October 1984 report they were well treated without physical or verbal abuse. Prisoners are adequately fed and supervised by professional prison wardens. They are normally incarcerated on isolated islands, although family visits are routinely arranged.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

In October 1984 four persons were arrested without charge in conjunction with anti-Government demonstrations. Unlike those charged with unlawful assembly, these persons appear to be held under a security act which allows detention without the right of habeas corpus. According to family members, they are well treated but have not been advised of any charges against them. Three of the four were released in November 1984. This detention act, enacted in December 1981 following an attack by mercenaries, has been used sparingly. Police have, however, arrested persons for 24 hours for "questioning" regarding anti-Government activities. Frequently, opponents of the Government have been urged to emigrate, an option many have chosen over the years.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Seychelles jurisprudence is patterned in large measure on English common law, although there is heavy influence of Napoleonic law, as well. Judges are provided under arrangements with British Commonwealth countries and have exhibited considerable independence from both the executive and legislative branches of the Government. The Chief Justice, however, stressed in two addresses during 1984 that it is the judiciary's responsibility to impose sentences as required by law and that the judiciary should reflect the will of the people as expressed in laws passed by the legislature. Those charged with demonstrating were charged under a former British colonial law which prohibits unlawful assembly (i.e., without a government permit). In 1984 the President remanded a rape case involving members of the armed forces to civilian courts for adjudication. Seychelles law requires that members of the armed forces be tried by court martial unless the President decrees otherwise. This decision was widely hailed as a step forward, since court martial penalties were sometimes seen as too lenient. Defendants in non-political cases have access to counsel and have enjoyed speedy and fair trials.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Seychelles authorities have broad powers of search and seizure without warrant. A new law passed in 1984, the Seychelles Marketing Board Act, allows police to enter any premises, private or public, and to seize any documents which they believe may violate the Act. Unlike 1983 when there were many reported violations of private homes, there were few reports of such actions in 1984. Legislation exists which allows the Government to open mail, domestic as well as international, and it is widely believed the Government does so. Some foreign visitors have complained of surveillance by security forces. Since June 1983 the Government has embarked on a campaign to nationalize private property. Although it has stated that compensation will be paid, negotiations with the previous owners are continuing. The Government claimed at the time the legislation was passed that it intended to use its powers to claim unused agricultural land. Yet there have been four seizures of hotels, as well as private residences.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Although theoretically protected under the Constitution of 1979, freedom of speech is curtailed in practice. Legislation provides for up to three years detention for anyone "who with intent to bring the President into hatred, ridicule or contempt, publishes any defamatory or insulting matter whether in writing, print or word of mouth or in any other manner." Apparently no charges have been brought under this legislation. This same legislation allows a two-year sentence for anyone who "prints, makes, imports, sells, supplies, offers for sale or supply, distributes, reproduces, or has in his possession or control" any publication banned by the Government for security reasons, but again there has been no prosecution under it. The Government has sought to curtail the importation of pamphlets printed by its opposition abroad.

The Government controls the major newspaper in the country, as well as all radio and television broadcasting. The Catholic Church publishes an increasingly lively paper, "Echo Des Isles," which is not subject to government control or censorship. Since the President promised not to interfere with religious expression in September 1984, that paper has published hard-hitting articles which obliquely criticize the Government. The two largest religious denominations in the country, the Roman Catholic and Anglican Churches, are each provided two free hours of uncensored broadcasting each month. Again, in late 1984 both churches have used these broadcasts to comment on social and political issues. Foreign broadcasts are widely listened to and are uncensored. Except for opposition material, foreign publications, including those critical of the Government, have been imported and sold without hindrance.

Persons who seek to mobilize public opinion against the Government, however, run a serious risk of being arrested for "questioning" or can face social and economic harassment. Some who have worked for the Government have been fired without recourse to appeal or review. Others have been encouraged to leave the country either by direct threat or through anonymous threats which they believe originate from Government officials. Foreign nationals critical of the Government have been requested to depart.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

A law dating from 1959 inhibits the right of peaceful assembly without government permit. Some 38 persons were arrested in 1984 and charged with unlawful assembly when police broke up a peaceful demonstration.

SEYCHELLES

There is one legal union (the National Workers Union) which is under direct control of the ruling party. It does not function as a free trade union, although it has some limited powers to negotiate wage increases and better working conditions for its members. Legislation was passed in 1983 which restricts an employer from dismissing workers. There has been no official strike in Seychelles since 1977, although 1984 saw a "work stoppage" by stevedores who protested a change in their contract. The issues were handled peacefully and without publicity in meetings between the union, workers, and government. All associations, clubs, and other groups require government permission to organize. The National Workers Union is a member of the Ghana-based, continent-wide, Organization of African Trade Union Unity (OATUU).

c. Freedom of Religion

There has been no official religious persecution in Seychelles and the President in 1984 publicly reiterated his support for religious freedom. The Roman Catholic and Anglican churches have flourished, and Muslims and Hindus are unrestricted in their religious practices. Seychelles has granted a license for many years to a Protestant radio station which broadcasts throughout Asia and Africa. There is, however, a clear separation between church and state. Religious instruction in schools has been limited, and the church has complained that artificial impediments have made it difficult, if not impossible, for children (ages 14-17) in the National Youth Service to attend church on a weekly basis. Church services are widely attended and are uncensored.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no restrictions on internal travel. Passports may now be acquired by virtually any citizen, although Seychellois traveling abroad for study at Government expense are required to sign a bond which enables the Government to regain the cost of their education should they fail to return. Such persons who are "bonded" must have Government permission to travel abroad following their return. In 1984 the Government granted a passport to a suspected dissident for emigration to the United States. There are no known cases in which passports are currently being withheld. There are no restrictions on voluntary repatriation for those who accept the present political system.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Since 1979 there has been only one legal political party, the Seychelles Peoples' Progressive Front. All political (and much social) activity is channeled through this institution. President Rene, as President of the country and Secretary General of the party, wields great power and authority. Opponents of the party can neither organize nor express public opposition. The party has a number of regional offices called "branches" which are responsible for organizing and supervising discussion about current government policies. These "branches" are encouraged to report public opinion in their regions, and to report views to the Executive Committee. In fact, such discussions do not often result in policy changes, which are directed from above.

SEYCHELLES

Presidential elections were held in 1984. President Rene, in an effort to overcome a move by his opponents to boycott the uncontested election, threatened that persons who failed to register ran the risk of losing certain benefits and privileges they enjoyed as citizens of Seychelles. The President received over 90 percent of those casting valid ballots.

Section 4 Government Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Since 1983 there have been no requests or inquiries regarding human rights in the Seychelles. Amnesty International states it did not have sufficient information to allow an entry on the Seychelles in its 1984 Report. Freedom House rates the Seychelles "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Seychelles enjoys a relatively high standard of living for an underdeveloped country. Per capita GNP in 1982 was $1,485. Free health services of a high standard are available to all persons. Infant mortality is 19.4 per thousand, one of the lowest in Africa. Life expectancy [69.9 years] approaches that found in many West European countries. Free universal education is available for all children, and in the case of academically qualified students, a minimum of 13 years education is provided by the state. Recent changes in the National Youth Service, a two-year program which is virtually compulsory for all children ages 14-16, have emphasized the importance of academic training. Children are now granted one weekend leave per month, a move designed to dampen parental concern that the influence of the family is being diminished in the program.

The status of women in this essentially matriarchal society is high. Women have the same legal, political, economic, and social rights as men. Although there are no women currently serving in the Council of Ministers, many senior officials up to and including the rank of Principal Secretary are women.

Nutrition requirements of most Seychellois are easily met through an abundance of food available throughout the country. Seychelles has the highest per capita consumption of fish in the world, a diet amply supplemented by a variety of fresh fruits and vegetables. Unemployment remains a serious problem, although the Government has emphasized development plans which are as labor intensive as possible. A "full employment scheme" also provides manual labor for anyone who desires to work at a rate set by the Government. The Government remains the largest employer in the country. Some persons who are believed by the Government to oppose its policies have found it difficult to gain employment.

SIERRA LEONE

After gaining independence from Britain in 1961, Sierra Leone adopted a multi-party parliamentary system with an independent judiciary. In June 1978, a new Constitution was approved by national referendum which established a one-party government under the All People's Congress. Other parties challenged the legitimacy of the referendum but eventually acquiesced and joined the Congress. The Constitution also extended the term of President Siaka Probyn Stevens for an additional seven years. President Stevens first assumed executive power in 1968. A year earlier, after his party had apparently won a narrow victory in multi-party elections, a military coup prevented Dr. Stevens from forming a government. A subsequent coup the next year restored civilian rule and brought Stevens to power.

The President is the predominant executive authority in the country. A cabinet, selected by the President from elected members of parliament, meets with the President regularly and has influence on the President's decision-making. Sierra Leone's unicameral Parliament also takes its direction from the executive. The first elections for the one-party parliament were held in 1982. There were contested elections in about two-thirds of the constituencies.

Violence marred the elections in several constituencies, and the results were challenged by those who lost the elections. The judiciary has decided 18 petition cases reversing victories in 5 cases. Two cases have yet to be heard and two cases are still in the courts. One of the latter involves the outcome in the Pujehun East constituency where a protegee of the then Minister of Justice won a disputed election. In that constituency (in southeastern Sierra Leone near the Liberian border) violence continued after the election. A local politician was murdered. Gangs, believed to be motivated by revenge and/or personal gain, murdered, looted and burned villages. The strong-armed methods of the indisciplined Special Security Detachment (SSD) of the police worsened the situation. After four SSD members were murdered in October 1983 the Sierra Leone army was dispatched to the area to restore order. The troops detained between 100 to 150 suspects in operations in November and December 1983. Unlike the SSD, the army showed discipline, and there were no fatalities caused by its operations. The Government never revealed the total number of detainees. A local newspaper in April 1984 charged that 122 suspects had been detained and that ten had died of natural causes because of unhealthful prison conditions. The Sierra Leonean paper called on the Government to charge the detainees or release them; but the Government did not respond. On July 13, one day after Amnesty International alleged in a broadcast on BBC that "political prisoners" were dying in Sierra Leone, the Government, while denying the accusations, charged 32 individuals with a variety of offenses including murder, arson and robbery, and released 69 on bond while the investigation continued.

The judiciary generally maintains its independence from the executive and has been reasonably effective in protecting basic legal rights. However, there are allegations that some court officials are increasingly subject to political manipulation and influence by bribes.

The press rebounded in 1984. A year earlier, implementation of the newspaper act, which set qualification standards for editors and a fee for registration of newspapers, had temporarily caused the number of privately-owned newspapers to shrink drastically. There are now seven privately-owned newspapers appearing with varying degrees of regularity. They enjoy considerable freedom. There is no prior press censorship. Articles on sensitive political and economic topics, investigative reporting into government shortcomings, including on occasion criticism of ministers and the President, have been published. However, there are limits on the independent press. Two newspaper editors were imprisoned, without being formally charged with any offense, for publishing particularly critical pieces on government corruption.

The Constitution recognizes the right of private property for Sierra Leone citizens, and most of the modern sector of the economy is in private hands. There is also government ownership, or partial ownership, in parts of certain key sectors, particularly mining and transportation. In addition, the Government attempts to control wholesale and retail prices, allocate foreign exchange, and set agricultural producer prices. Sierra Leone is considered by the United Nations to be among the world's least developed countries and its economy has been declining for the past decade.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no political killings in 1984.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of abduction of individuals by the Government or hostage taking by non-governmental groups.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There have been no reports of torture or of degrading treatment or punishment. However, the country's economic decline, the resultant shrinking of budget revenues combined with a rising crime rate have led to a dangerous overcrowding of prisons. There were repeated stories in the local press throughout 1984 deploring prison conditions and reporting prison deaths due to natural causes including malnutrition, pneumonia, diarrhea and gastroenteritis. The Government has not responded to these local press reports but did take issue with an Amnesty International allegation broadcast by BBC that 19 prisoners had died in detention due to neglect and malnutrition. The Sierra Leone Government responded that from January to July 1984 only five prisoners had died and malnutrition was not the cause of death.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Habeas corpus is part of Sierra Leone common law and is observed in practice. Under the Constitution of 1978, the President may take measures to detain any person who is, or is reasonably suspected to be, "dangerous to the well-being of the Republic". Writs of habeas corpus granted by the court during such an emergency would not extend to applicants detained pursuant to an order under the Public Emergency Act. A state of emergency must come into force within 28 days after the detention, or a detainee not charged with an offense must be released. There is no one currently being detained under Public Emergency Regulations. In 1984 on two occasions journalists were detained for publishing articles critical of the Government.

In November and December 1983, approximately 100 to 150 persons were detained by the army in an operation to restore order in the Pujehun. No state of emergency was declared but there was a lengthy delay in charging the detainees. On July 13 the Government finally charged 32 detainees with a variety of offenses including murder, arson, and robbery, and released 69. The reasons for the delay are disputed. Some government officials say unusual circumstances caused the delay: i.e., the large number of detainees, the fact they were rounded up in a military operation, the resultant slowness in police preparation of the reports, leading finally to further delay in the understaffed Attorney General's office. Other observers have claimed that the Government let the detainees languish in prison because they attacked its political supporters in the Pujehun.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The judiciary has generally maintained its independence from the Government, although some critics charge that the legal system is increasingly subject to political manipulation, often before cases reach the courts. The Constitution gives the President power to remove judges after age 55--a provision which has not to date been invoked. Sierra Leone's courts have a reputation for providing fair, public trials. Defendents are allowed counsel of their choice, and convictions may be appealed. However, many poor defendants cannot afford counsel, and public defense is provided only in cases of capital offenses. Persons detained under the Public Emergency Act are not guaranteed a hearing (unless charged with a criminal offense).

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Legal safeguards against arbitrary invasion of the home are observed. Rights of the individuals and family are not abused by the State. Censorship of mail and electronic eavesdropping on private conversations through bugging or wiretaps have not been reported. However, some organizations have claimed that informers report to the Government on their activities.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech is legally guaranteed, but under the Constitution this freedom can be abridged if the proper functioning of the party is deemed in jeopardy. In practice, the Government tolerates public criticism by individual citizens, and academic freedom is unabridged. However, since 1978 no opposition party has been permitted. Most opposition groups are based in the United States and the United Kingdom. There have been no reports of opposition groups attempting to criticize the party or the Government publicly inside Sierra Leone. The political propaganda of exile opposition groups is not allowed to circulate in Sierra Leone.

The Government affirms press rights. President Stevens has, on several occasions, stated publicly that there is no press censorship in Sierra Leone. But the President usually adds that criticism should be fair and not abusive, and that journalists, in criticizing, should try to place things in the context of the nation's development processes.

There is considerable press freedom. The privately-owned press tested its limits in 1984 by reporting on sensitive political topics. For example, one series of investigative reports on mishandling of funds led to the firing of a cabinet minister and even the President was criticized for his handling of a cabinet shakeup. However, the Government expects journalists to exercise some self-censorship. When two newspaper editors published particularly critical pieces on corruption in top government circles, they were imprisoned without being charged with any offense, although their newspapers continued to publish. One of the offending articles was subheaded "Time is Up for Pa's (i.e., President Stevens) Boys" and attacked members of the ruling All Peoples's Congress of which the President is Secretary-General, and called on the President to "clear away his corrupt and arrogant ministers..." The Acting Editor was imprisoned in September after his paper printed the foregoing. He was held without charge until December 11 when he was finally released.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution guarantees the rights of freedom of assembly and to form or belong to trade unions or other economic, social, or professional associations. However, it places limits on these rights, most significantly where assembly or association would conflict with the "proper functioning of the party" or the requirements of public order. In practice, freedom of association in the nonpolitical sphere is respected. Trade unions normally operate freely and exercise the right to organize, to negotiate, and to strike against employers. However, when trade union activities publicly challenged government policy in 1981, the Government arrested approximately 180 union members. Late in 1982, the Congress was allowed to elect a new executive committee, and it is now functioning independently of the Government. Most major sectors of the Sierra Leone economy, except agriculture are unionized.

Private associations of citizens can and do make representations to the government on policy issues and are not subject to reprisals.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is a tradition of religious tolerance in Sierra Leone. Muslims (the most numerous religious group), Christians, animists, and adherents of other faiths practice their religions freely without government interference. The state is non-sectarian and does not discriminate on the basis of religious belief.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The major official restriction on travel within the country is in diamond mining areas and is intended to control smuggling. There are few regulations restricting foreign travel. A few Sierra Leoneans who oppose the one-party Government are in self-imposed exile.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

President Stevens is the dominant authority in Sierra Leone. Since independence in 1961, the clear trend in political development has been the increase of the executive power and the lessening of constitutional checks on that power. At present, the unicameral Parliament is clearly subservient to the executive branch of the Government. President Stevens' term of office was extended by the Constitution of 1978 for an additional seven years. Moreover, the Constitution provides that the leader of the party will be the sole candidate for the office of President. Candidates for Parliament are chosen in each constituency by the Party's local executive committee. The executive committee chooses three candidates from the list of citizens who sought nomination. The central committee of the party has the power to disapprove the nomination of any candidate selected by the local executive committees if it believes the candidacy would be inimical to the state. The decisions of the central committee on the candidacies are final. There was no report that candidates were rejected by the central committee in the 1982 elections. In practice, the legal procedure for choosing candidates is supplemented by an informal vetting process in which the President influences the selection of candidates. In the 1982 elections, there were contests in about two-thirds of the constituencies. Court challenges by electoral losers were independently reviewed by the judiciary.

Electoral violence stemming from ethnic tensions is a continuing problem. The Cabinet named by the President after the 1982 elections was ethnically balanced. The post-election appointment of a former leader of the opposition party to a key cabinet post is also viewed as a sign that progress in healing sectional and ethnic rifts is being made.

In addition to the national political system, there is also a traditional system which operates in the provinces outside of the urban area. Paramount chiefs are elected for life by the members of the chiefdom council. They have considerable authority in local affairs and in resolving traditional disputes.

There is universal suffrage, and no groups are precluded from voting because of sex, tribal, racial, or religious factors.

Section 4 Governmental Attitudes Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

In 1984 Amnesty International queried Sierra Leone about persons detained as the result of the Pujehun disorders who had been held for several months without being charged. No response was given but in July the detainees were either charged or released. In August 1983, Parliament ratified the Organization of African Unity's African Charter on Human and People's Rights. Freedom House terms Sierra Leone "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Sierra Leone, a nation of 3.8 million with a per capita gross domestic product of $386 a year (1982 figure), is classified by the United Nations as among the world's least developed countries. Its population growth rate of 2.6 percent per annum exceeded GDP growth from 1970 to 1982, which averaged 2.0 per year. Since 1981, the situation has worsened. Life expectancy at birth is 41 years and the infant mortality rate is 197 per 1000. Adult literacy is estimated at 15 percent.

Many of the factors contributing to the decline in the living standard of most Sierra Leoneans are beyond Sierra Leonean control. These include gradual depletion of alluvial diamond deposits, rising fuel import bills, and, since the late 1970's, declining world prices for mineral and agricultural exports. Yet government economic policy and mismanagement have worsened the situation as budget deficits have led to high inflation (about 40 percent in 1983). The overvaluation of the leone has accelerated and with it smuggling and black market activities. Low rates of domestic savings and investment have left the country heavily dependent on external assistance for development efforts. Mismanagement has limited the return on the country's limited investment.

Women in Sierra Leone are guaranteed equal rights by the Constitution. In practice access to education for women remains more limited than it is for men. For example, only 39 percent of the children enrolled in primary school are female (1977 figure). Yet this figure indicates gradual improvement has been made since independence. The status of women varies substantially in different parts of the country and depends upon cultural values of various tribal groups. In some areas of Sierra Leone women have been elected to the prestigious position of paramount chief. In other areas, this would not happen. In the modern sector, women are prominent in the professions and one woman is a Supreme Court Justice. The political sphere continues to be overwhelmingly male-dominated.

SOMALIA

Somalia, a nominally constitutional democracy in which civil and political rights are very limited, has been ruled for the past 15 years by President Mohamed Siad Barre, as head of the armed forces and Secretary General of the Somalia Revolutionary Socialist Party, the country's single political party. The formal government structure includes a Supreme Revolutionary Council formed in 1969 (now moribund), the Somali Revolutionary Socialist Party formed in 1976, a People's Assembly established in 1980, and a 45-member Council of Ministers. The President also regularly convenes the party politburo, a closer circle of advisors composed of the most powerful four or five ministers of government. However, the ultimate source of the President's political authority is the military, which brought him to power in 1969. The importance of the military in Somali society is reinforced by the continuing conflict between Somalia and Ethiopia over the area of Ethiopia populated by ethnic Somalis, as well as by the military's occasional role, along with the police, as keeper of civil order.

Ethiopia and Somalia support armed dissident activity against the other. Dissident activity increased in 1984 beginning with the bombing of the Addis to Djibouti railway in January, to which Ethiopia reacted with the bombing of the town of Borama in the same month. Somali incursions into Ethiopia are more difficult to track than Ethiopian activities. Recent Ethiopian overflights have extended as far east of disputed areas as Baidoa--only 150 kilometers from Mogadishu.

Significant numbers of ethnic Somalis live in the neighboring states of Kenya and Djibouti, as well as Ethiopia. There are no active territorial disputes between Somalia and either Kenya or Djibouti.

The 1979 Constitution provides limited guarantees of political and civil rights. However, it also contains provisions allowing for its selective suspension, and these were invoked by President Siad during a state of emergency between October 1980 and February 1982. While the Constitution has been reinstated, civil and political rights are tightly circumscribed and organized criticism of the Government is not permitted.

Somalia has only one ethnic group, the Somali, which is subdivided into clans and clan groups. Although the country is ethnically and linguistically homogeneous, the clan divisions have a major impact on internal politics. Women have a prominent voice in many aspects of social and cultural life and have made inroads in government and business with the strong support of President Siad. In general, religious practices are not restricted, although proselytizing is not allowed, and religious leaders are not permitted to discuss political themes in their sermons.

Somalia is a poor country with few natural resources. Most Somalis earn their living as herdsmen or farmers. The country's economic development suffers from frequent drought and recurrent conflict with Ethiopia, which has resulted in heavy defense expenditures and a massive refugee problem. Somalia receives substantial international refugee assistance, and large amounts of development assistance, commodity aid, and budget support. Most of the modern sector of the economy is government controlled and plagued by bureaucratic inefficiencies and a lack of adequately trained personnel. In recent years the Government has encouraged development of the private sector and foreign investment. Change has been slow, but Somalia has made some economic and financial progress through joint efforts with the International Monetary Fund and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

The Government commitment to develop the private sector has involved divestiture of some state-owned organizations. In addition, organizations such as the General Federation of Somali Trade Unions and the Union of Somali Cooperatives Movement, which previously were tightly controlled by the central government and the party, appear to have been allowed more independence.

The principal arm of the internal security apparatus is the National Security Service, which can arrest and detain people indefinitely. The Government shows little hesitation in imprisoning those whom it sees as a threat to its security. Political prisoners have occasionally been held for years, then released and rehabilitated, with some of them assuming responsible positions in the Government. The exact number of political detainees is unknown, but estimated to be 350 to 500, with new prisoners being incarcerated as others are released. Many have not yet been charged.

The 1983 Agreement with the International Committee of the Red Cross on Welfare of Prisoners of War has met with limited success, and discussions are continuing on ICRC concern for the welfare and repatriation of Ethiopian POW's (as well as contact with Somali relatives of POW's held by Ethiopia).

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no reported instances of political killings by the Government in 1984. The Ethiopian-based Somali National Movement has issued radio statements that it is targeting prominent Issak clan supporters of the Siad Barre Government and has waged a bombing campaign in the northwest city of Hargeisa.

b. Disappearance

There were no reported cases of disappearance in 1984.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There continue to be allegations of systematic torture, but they have not been substantiated. There is evidence of rough treatment of criminal suspects by Somali police authorities in order to obtain confessions. Living conditions in prisons can be harsh.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Despite a constitutional provision guaranteeing formal charges and a speedy trial, arrests without warrants and indefinite detention without charges do occur in cases involving dissenters and others viewed by the Government as a threat to national security. At least 200 of the 350-500 political prisoners are being detained without charge, including six high government officials arrested in June 1982. A seventh died in prison. Others deemed to be no longer a threat to the Government have been released in the past year. These include a former Chief of Police and the wife of a defector who had been listed by Amnesty International as a prisoner of conscience. Habeas corpus does not exist in cases having to do with national security. In at least some cases, political prisoners are denied visitors and access to lawyers prior to being formally charged. Delays in bringing charges can be lengthy in criminal cases as well.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Somali court system, in both criminal and political cases, is subject to review and control by the Executive. Since 1970, judges have been nominated by the Supreme Revolutionary Council and all positions of the Higher Judicial Council, the highest judicial review body, have been taken over by Supreme Revolutionary Council members. The 1979 Constitution made the President Chairman of the Higher Judicial Council and added amnesty matters to its jurisdiction, thereby compromising the independence of the judiciary. In regular courts, judges refer to the Koran in rendering legal decisions pertaining to family matters such as marriage and inheritance. Prisoners can be held indefinitely without charge, and in some cases they can be tried without a lawyer in a closed session. The National Security Court, established in 1969, has authority with no right of appeal in cases of crimes against the State, the Government, or public order. Its deliberations are secret, and it is directly subordinate to the Government.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

"Mobilization campaigns" are organized by the Somali Revolutionary Socialist Party to promote public participation in, and enthusiasm for, various civic and national programs as well as general support for government policies. Participation in these campaigns is urged but not strictly enforced.

The National Security Service has the authority to search homes without warrants and detain anyone suspected of being a political dissenter. This authority extends to wiretapping and opening of mail although there is no evidence that such practices are broadly used. Through a comprehensive network of informants the National Security Service is capable of effectively tracking the movements of individuals. This gives it the potential, if not the actual, ability to collect a great deal of information on private citizens. As a result, it is feared by most citizens.

Throughout 1984 there has been sporadic forced conscription into the military.

SOMALIA

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The media are owned and operated by the Government, and they are devoted to disseminating information and opinion acceptable to the Government. Dissenting views are not allowed public expression. Members of opposition groups are not permitted public expression of their views and are subject to indefinite imprisonment for publicly criticizing the Government. However, anti-Government pamphlets and tracts do occasionally surface in urban centers. Foreign publications are subject to sporadic censorship.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

All non-religious organizations and public gatherings in the country are subject to government control or supervision. Rallies or meetings of a direct political nature are organized only by the Government to promote its own programs. The country's single labor confederation is government controlled and has no right to strike. The main role of the unions is to organize government oversight of the work force by monitoring its mood and providing a conduit for worker grievances. Government regulation of the General Federation of Somali Trade Unions and the Union of Somali Cooperatives Movement has eased considerably during 1984, with the result that these formerly rigid Soviet-style organizations are making tentative contact with their autonomous Western counterparts. The GFSTU labor confederation is a member at the Ghana-based, continent wide, Organization of African Trade Union Unity (OATUU), as well as of the International Confederation of Arab Trade Unions (ICATU).

c. Freedom of Religion

Islam is the state religion and is adhered to by over 95 percent of the population. There is little Government interference in religious matters. However, some tensions are created by government appeals for national consolidation which cut across the clan and religious groupings of the traditional political system. Religious groups such as the Sufi orders enjoy religious freedom, but they have learned from past experience not to try to influence the political process. Members of religions other than Islam may freely practice their faith but may not proselytize.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Internal travel is not formally restricted but is controlled through numerous police and military checkpoints in the towns, border areas, and places where inter-clan violence occurs. Although passports can be obtained by any Somali citizen, the Government prevents the departure of people it does not wish to leave the country, especially young men of military age, by denying exit visas. Emigration is permitted but not for government employees. The Somali Government does not exile its opponents. Somalis who have left the country to reside abroad have done so voluntarily, either because of economic opportunities or because they oppose the President. The Government allows repatriation, and in some cases provides former dissident exiles with official government or military positions. In other cases, returnees have been interrogated and detained indefinitely without trial for anti-Government activities.

There are 350-400,000 ethnic Somali refugees from Ethiopia in Somalia. For political and kinship reasons, refugees are not forced to return to Ethiopia. In fact, the Somali Government prefers that they not return. While it is not possible for authorities to police the movement of individuals in the more remote refugee camp sites, there have been reports of the military periodically preventing the departure of large groups of refugees. In addition, cases of government conscription of refugees from camps into the armed forces have continued in 1984. In mid to late 1984 there was a new influx of displaced persons from Ethiopia arriving mainly in northwest Somalia coincident with severe drought conditions in Ethiopia and institutionalization of political changes there along Soviet lines.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

President Siad Barre rules Somalia and controls political participation through the single legal party. The Somali Revolutionary Socialist Party directs participation in Somali political affairs for individuals and organizations, such as the General Federation of Somali Trade Unions, the Somali Women's Democratic Organization, and the Somali Revolutionary Youth Union. Elections were last held for the People's Assembly in December 1979, consisting of a vote for or against the party's national slate of candidates running uncontested. The Constitution stipulates that elections be held every five years, but the President has the power to delay elections.

There is no legal opposition and criticism of government policies is forbidden. Recognizing the continuing strength of the traditonal, clan-based political system, President Siad and members of his Government frequently hold formal and informal consultations with various clan leaders. President Siad has used clan politics to consolidate and maintain his rule by placing members of his own clan, the Marehan, in key positions. However, members of other clans are also allocated responsible positions in government. Clan identification is very strong and, for many Somalis, the traditional system is the accepted method of political expression. Clan politics and clan rivalries occasionally erupt into violence.

Women and minorities participate in politics and government. The Somali Women's Democratic Organization, though subordinate to the party, has advocated greater political participation and mobilization for women. President Siad has long been an advocate of greater rights for women, despite Islamic opposition to this policy. A number of women are in Parliament and in important positions in various ministries and within the party, and Somalia has recently appointed its first woman Ambassador.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Somali Government has refused permission for foreign officials or human rights organizations to visit political prisoners, although in 1983 Somalia allowed an International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) team to inspect facilities for prisoners of war from the conflict with Ethiopia. An ICRC representative is now accredited to Somalia. There are no Somali organizations which are actively concerned with human rights issues. In addressing itself to human rights issues at international forums, Somalia usually limits itself to general statements and to criticism of human rights practices in Ethiopia. The International Parliamentary Union has approved resolutions calling on the Somali Government to release the six parliamentarians held under arrest since 1982. Amnesty International in its 1984 Report also expressed its concern over the continued detention of these (and other) persons without trial, and stated that it had requested details on the death of a seventh, who had reportedly been refused hospital admission and denied access to family. The Attorney General later sent Amnesty International a copy of the post mortem report, which indicated kidney failure, but provided no further information or guarantees on treatment of prisoners. Freedom House terms Somalia "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Sixty percent of Somalia's 6.4 million people are nomads, 20 percent are settled rural dwellers, and 20 percent are urban. Statistics on Somali economic and social conditions are limited and often inaccurate. Per capita gross national product in 1982 was about $295, making Somalia one of the poorest countries in the world. Life expectancy at birth is 39.6 years and the infant mortality rate is 171.8 per one thousand births. The adult literacy rate in Somali is estimated at 6 percent (male 11 percent, female 3 percent) and about 5.2 percent in other languages such as Arabic, Italian, English, and Russian. The primary school enrollment ratio in 1980 was 38 percent, (male 47 percent, female 29 percent). The ratio of calorie supply available for consumption relative to nutritional requirements was 96 percent in 1977. The percentage of population with access to safe drinking water was 33 percent in 1976.

The health of the Somali people is poor, with the principal causes of morbidity and mortality being malnutrition and infectious disease including diarrhea, malaria, measles, whooping cough, and respiratory infections. Health service facilities are generally poor, although urban inhabitants benefit from a wider range of government health and social services. Somali nomads are poorer than the urban population, with limited access to health and social services. The livelihood of this group is also subject to the greatest degree of risk because of recurrent droughts. The unavailablity of health care and other social services is due to the country's poverty and primary attention to security issues, rather than any deliberate government policy of neglect.

Somali culture remains overwhelmingly traditional. This allows a degree of social support for individuals, but also permits the continuation of practices such as female circumcision. The Somali Government has improved the legal and political status of women in recent years to allow participation in the work place and in government. In 1975 women were given equal rights in several respects, including equal inheritance rights. The Government also promotes universal and coeducational schooling to the extent that resources allow. However, the dominance of traditional cultures is giving way slowly.

SOUTH AFRICA

South Africa is a multiracial country whose laws codify the doctrine of apartheid (racial separation) under which the white minority dominates national political institutions and defines the basic rights and obligations of people according to their racial or ethnic origin. Accordingly, the black majority suffers from pervasive discrimination in political, economic, and social life. The Black African majority (73%) continues to be denied the basic rights of citizenship and political participation except through the government device of designating tribal areas as rural "homelands" and through tightly controlled urban councils.

South Africa in 1984 continued the gradualist reform process seen in recent years and the implementation of a new Constitution which for the first time provides limited representation in Parliament to "colored" (mixed race) and Asian South Africans. But 1984 also witnessed a widespread boycott of elections held under that Constitution and outbreaks of serious urban unrest over political and economic grievances, resulting in at least 200 deaths. The Government responded with increased use of state repression, including police violence against urban protesters and widespread detentions under stringent security legislation. Army units assisted police in cordon and search operations in townships. As the year ended, basic questions about government thinking on the pace and direction of further reform remained unanswered.

South Africa's parliamentary system is dominated by the 16.2 percent of the South African population which is white. Previous elections have been free and fair for whites. The 1984 colored and Asian elections were also fairly conducted, although only a minority of eligible voters participated. The press is outspoken, but circumscribed by legislation, government pressure, and self-restraint. Free labor unions exist and the right of collective bargaining has been extended to the growing number of black unions that have emerged in recent years. Trade unionists frequently suffer official harassment, persecution, and detention. South Africa's judiciary is independent, but security legislation encroaches broadly on judicial power.

The new Constitution approved by white voters in 1983, which went into effect in September 1984, abandons the former all-white Westminster model and creates a strong executive, the State President. The carefully structured Parliament, based on a racial ratio of 4:2:1 (white: colored: Asian), ensures white control and continues to deny any national role to blacks, but does require participation on some legislation, including that affecting blacks, by all chambers of Parliament. The full impact of the new Constitution on apartheid legislation will only become evident once these institutions begin to function, starting in early 1985. While 1984 passed without further repeal of major apartheid legislation, the South African Government pledged that its next step is to address the issue of black participation in the political process. The Government also signaled its willingness to take a more realistic view towards black residency rights in urban areas by such moves as the extension of 99-year leaseholds for blacks in the Western Cape, and by shifting the emphasis from "influx control" to keep blacks out of the cities to one of "orderly" urbanization.

SOUTH AFRICA

The practice of apartheid remains the basis for the organization of South African society. Discriminatory laws and practices are woven throughout the fabric of South African life. Important examples include: (a) the Constitution itself; (b) legislation which limits black South Africans to generally resource poor and overpopulated "homelands", or deprives them of citizenship through creation of "independent" homelands; (c) influx control or "pass" laws which prescribe the conditions under which black workers and their families may remain outside the homelands; (d) separate and unequal educational systems for the various race groups; (e) the Group Areas Act, which mandates separate residential areas for whites, coloreds, Asians, and blacks; (f) the Immorality and Mixed Marriages Acts (now under review) which make sexual relations or marriage between whites and persons of other races illegal; (g) the Separate Amenities Act, which limits the use of public facilities to persons of a particular race group (without requiring equivalent facilities for other race groups). Through the years, the South African Government has also enacted legislation that, in the name of security, curtails the civil liberties of any person whose statements, actions, or associations are viewed as a serious threat to established order. An effective judicial remedy against the denationalization of blacks or against forced resettlement still does not exist.

As South Africa increasingly industrializes, the need for skilled black labor has created a black labor force of nearly 10 million people residing near existing urban industrial areas. These realities, created by economic growth, conflict directly with the basic aim of "grand apartheid", namely the perpetuation of the physical separation of whites from nonwhites, and they serve as well to focus attention on political and human rights for the 10 million urban blacks. In recent years black workers have benefited from rising wages and improving conditions of service, but they are increasingly vulnerable to the economic cycle.

At least 200 people were killed in violent political demonstrations in black "townships" during 1984, some as a result of internecine strife but most as a result of action by the police. Hundreds of individuals, including prominent trade union, student, and community leaders, were detained by the Government in connection with anti-constitution demonstrations and subsequent expressions of disagreement with government policy, such as a widespread work "stayaway" held in the Transvaal November 5-6. Some detainees were released by the Government December 7 and 10, but others were charged with "subversion" or treason.

Also in 1984, the African National Congress (ANC) continued its campaign of violence against the South African Government, with bomb attacks throughout the country. The South African Government sought to curtail ANC activity through both police and diplomatic means, most notably through the signing of the Nkomati Accord with Mozambique. Unlike in previous years, the South African defense force waged no cross-border attacks against neighboring states in 1984. South African troops remain in south central Angola pending completion of the agreement on disengagement of forces signed with the Angolan Government in Lusaka in February 1984. In Namibia, South African troops still fight the Southwest Africa People's Organization (SWAPO), a Marxist-oriented liberation movement seeking independence for Namibia. In keeping with its regional/security goals, the South African Government became a mediator between the Mozambican Government and guerrillas seeking to topple it.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were three known deaths in detention cases during 1984, (nine in 1983). Widespread social unrest in black townships resulted in nearly 200 deaths of blacks either at the hands of other blacks or the police.

On February 22, 1984, Sergeant J. Van As of the security police was sentenced to 10 years in prison for shooting Paris Malatji while the latter was in detention for interrogation in 1983. Van As was the first security policeman prosecuted for an incident carried out in the line of duty.

The African National Congress (ANC) claimed responsibility for a string of sabotage acts during 1984. Targets were primarily installations and offices involved with the administration of apartheid, including police offices and courts, in both white South Africa and "independent" homelands. Durban and Johannesburg suffered the largest number of bombings in 1984. While ANC stated policy was to avoid civilian deaths, a number of innocent civilians died in ANC incidents, the most significant being two bombings in Durban which involved the deaths of seven people.

b. Disappearance

South African law does not require notification of a detainee's family, lawyer, or other person when an individual is detained or released, and people have simply disappeared into police custody for long periods. The Second Police Amendment Act of 1980 prohibits unauthorized publication of the name of any person detained for "the prevention of or combatting of terroristic activities." Police spokesmen usually do not volunteer information on detainees but will often respond to written inquiries about their status. As of the end of October, South African police had not released information on 31 persons arrested at a funeral in September.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Security legislation allows police considerable latitude in the arrest of suspects and in the interrogation of detainees. Defendants and witnesses in a number of political trials have testified in court that they were assaulted or abused by police during interrogation. Despite a 1982 ministerial directive to improve police handling, allegations of mistreatment of detainees during detention continued to be made in 1984. In a widely publicized trial, which focused attention on this question, former student leader Auret Van Heerden brought a civil suit against 10 security policemen for damages as a result of his alleged mistreatment during detention in 1981-82. The Supreme Court acquitted all but one policeman who was forced to pay Van Heerden $1,000, and made Van Heerden pay all court and legal fees for the defendants.

Van Heerden has filed an appeal against the court ruling. Venda security police continued to intimidate individuals they regarded as threats to state security. They used surprise visits, unexpected searches, and long questioning sessions in their own offices to frighten people.

Sections 18-23 of the Internal Security Act authorize the Minister of Law and Order to issue banning orders. Any person judged by the Minister as endangering law and order, threatening state security, or promoting the aims of communism or an unlawful organization can be (1) made to resign as an officer or member of any organization; (2) restricted to or excluded from certain areas; (3) prohibited from meeting with more than one person at a time; (4) ordered to report regularly to police stations; and (5) prohibited from being quoted or published. No court of law can challenge the Minister's power to issue banning orders, although the Internal Security Act does provide for administrative review of banning orders. According to the South African Institute of Race Relations, over 1,400 South Africans have been banned at one time or another since 1950. Approximately 370 of these persons left the country. One banning order on an individual was issued during 1984. In September 1984, the South African Government lifted the banning orders on Reverend Beyers Naude and Moki Cekisani. As of November 1984, the number of banned persons was 12, including one person banned in the Transkei under legislation adapted from South Africa.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Four clauses of the Internal Security Act authorize detention without charge or trial for varying--in some cases unlimited--periods. The Minister of Law and Order himself issues orders under Section 28, which he has characterized as preventive detention. Senior police officials may detain people for interrogation under Section 29 when offenses such as terrorism, sabotage, or inciting a revolutionary situation are suspected. Access to the detainee is severely restricted, and no court may challenge arrests under the provisions of this law. According to the Detainees Parents Support Committee, the South African Institute of Race Relations, and the South African Council or Churches, 572 people were detained as of August 30, 1984. The Minister of Law and Order refuted this figure and claimed that 242 were detained during the same period. The Minister stated to a journalist in late October that from January 1 to September 19, 138 people had been detained under Section 29, with 70 released. Under Section 15, of those detained in the same period in particularly violent situations for up to 14 days, 79 of 80 were released within the two-week period. Of 19 people detained under Section 28, none are now detained without charge; six were charged with treason or subversion. The Minister's figures do not include detentions in the "independent" homelands of the Transkei, the Ciskei and Venda. As a result of demonstrations against government policy that occurred between late August and November, hundreds of persons were detained under Sections of the Internal Security Act and the Criminal Procedures Act, but precise figures are not yet available. Some of these individuals have been released but face charges of "subversion" or high treason.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

While the principle of habeas corpus is affirmed in South African common law, it is nullified in practice by various security law provisions. If a person cannot pay for his or her defense, limited funds for legal assistance are available through the publicly funded Legal Aid Board or various private organizations. However, these sources do not accept all cases, nor do they meet more than a fraction of the total need. As a rule, the court will appoint counsel without charge only in cases involving capital offenses.

Because security detainees may be interrogated without access to counsel, they may admit to actions or charges the implications of which they may not fully understand. However, such statements often are not admissable in court. Many trials are held in camera or in distant parts of the country, making it difficult or impossible for family or others to attend. If deemed necessary by the court, witnesses may testify without being publicly identified. Security and criminal trials are held before regular courts, which are generally regarded as independent of executive or military control, although all judges and practically all magistrates are white. The black population has virtually no representation in the judicial system.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The system of apartheid, or political and social separation of ethnic groups, necessarily implies extensive government regulation of areas of social, personal, and family life, which in most democratic countries are considered matters of free choice. Membership in an ethnic group or race is based on definitions and decisions of the Government. In doubtful cases, racial classification is determined administratively by a racial classification board empowered to weigh evidence and to issue a verdict on an individual's race when the parents' racial classification is not known.

Under apartheid, the people with whom one associates are not a matter of free choice in many cases. The Immorality and Mixed Marriages Acts, for example, prohibit marriage or sexual relations between the races, although the Government tolerates some instances of "mixed" marriage. Prosecutions and convictions for violation of the Immorality and Mixed Marriages Acts have remained fairly constant over the past 20 years, averaging around 180 per year. In mid-1984, a Parliamentary Select Committee began study of changes, possibly including repeal of the Mixed Marriages Act and the relevant sections of the Immorality Act, but in September left decisions to the tricameral Parliament. The Separate Amenities Act allows premises to be reserved for the exclusive use of persons of a particular race. In recent years the Government has expanded the scope of administrative exceptions from apartheid laws allowing some restaurants, drive-in theaters, private hospitals, parks, libraries, and other public amenities to admit persons of all races upon application. Certain legal barriers to interracial sport have also been lifted. Although the Government announced in February that segregation of public facilities would now be discretionary rather than mandatory, few significant changes have occurred. A move by the Pretoria City Council to close 13 parks to blacks was defeated in April 1984. In October, the Durban City Council announced it would renew efforts to open Durban beaches to all races.

Freedom to choose one's own associates is largely and sytematically limited by the Group Areas Act, which decrees that the four officially distinguished racial groups, white, colored, Asian, and African, must live in separate areas. In the case of black South Africans, this means residing in one of the 10 "homelands" unless employment and state permission (so-called Section 10 rights) to reside in an urban area can be obtained. Until 1983, black home ownership outside the homelands was extremely limited by laws and restrictions. Most urban township homes are rented from the Government which owns and subsidizes them. Some more prosperous blacks construct their own houses in urban areas, but they cannot own the land. Since 1983 blacks may obtain 99-year leases on land in many urban areas for home construction, but they still do not enjoy freehold rights. In September 1984, the 99-year leasehold privilege was extended to the Western Cape and that area dropped a policy of labor preference for coloreds, potentially easing employment of blacks. Parliament amended the Group Areas Act in mid 1984 to grant the State President the authority to open central business districts to black entrepreneurs. The decision must be made in consultation with local authorities.

Since the pattern of group residence called for under the apartheid system does not correspond to the actual location of the various groups, the Government has forcibly relocated many people. The forced resettlement of black and colored "squatters" in urban areas and removal of black settled communities, so-called "black spots," from designated white areas to black tribal homelands have continued, despite an announcement by the Minister of Cooperation and Development in early 1984 that no more forced removals would take place. In early 1984, the Government forcibly removed the people of Mogopa, and throughout 1984, authorities knocked down squatter shacks near Cape Town. Since 1961 an estimated 3.5 million blacks, coloreds, and Asians have been forcibly relocated either in the homelands or to other parts of urban areas, according to statistics given in a 1983 report by the Surplus Peoples Project and a South African Council of Churches booklet published in 1984. The Minister of Cooperation and Development confirmed in May that two million blacks had been resettled since 1960. However, this figure does not include 834,400 resettled coloreds and Asians. (An additional 730,000 blacks found themselves inside the homelands when the boundaries were drawn.) Resettlement areas, particularly in the homelands, usually have inadequate facilities and inadequate land and water for agriculture. The Government has also required some white farmers to sell their land and relocate to allow for the creation of the homelands. However, the compensation paid by the Government in these cases is generally considered adequate.

Blacks' residences and travel are regulated by a system of "influx control" or "pass" laws which severely restrict the number of blacks entitled to remain in a given urban area for more that 72 hour at a time. Periodically, police conduct raids or sweeps of the restricted area during which all passes are checked. All persons illegally resident are arrested and/or transported to their associated homeland. In May 1983, the appeals court upheld a Supreme Court decision in the landmark Rikhoto case that migrants who have worked 10 years or more for the same employer or 15 years for different employers are entitled to permanent city residency. Blacks are winning Rikhoto rights, but the process is time-consuming, and the effects are not yet widespread. The Government effectively tied the granting of such rights to the availability of housing, and many people eligible for permanent city residency are prevented from taking up residency because of housing shortages.

In one administrative improvement in the influx control system in 1984, the Government assigned the "pass courts" to the regular magistrates' courts under the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice, resulting initially in fewer convictions on pass law violations. In late April 1984, the Minister of Cooperation and Development withdrew the highly contentious Orderly Movement and Settlement of Black Persons Act, partially because of its impact on those eligible for Section 10 rights.

The Black Urban Areas Consolidation Act allows police to enter homes without a warrant if any black is suspected of illegally residing or working in the area. The Criminal Procedures Act of 1977 authorizes a judge or magistrate to issue a search warrant if reasonable belief exists that "the internal security of the Republic or the maintenance of law and order is likely to be endangered by or in consequence of a 'meeting' being held in a given place". Under this same Act a police officer may enter, search, and question anyone in a place without a warrant if the officer has reason to believe a warrant would be issued but the delay caused by first obtaining the warrant would defeat the purpose of the search. In October 1984, 7,000 men of the South African police and the South African Defense Force surrounded the black township of Sebokeng, south of Johannesburg, and implemented a house-to-house search for "criminal elements." Police arrested 354 persons under various sections of the Criminal Procedures Act, most of whom were brought before specially established courts the same day, but others continued to be held. The stated purpose of the operation was to quell continuing unrest in the township in the wake of violence which broke out at the time of the colored and Asian elections.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The basically white-owned press continues to be a vigorous critic of the Government of South Africa. The press remains a vital channel of communication within South Africa and with the outside world. However, this press freedom is increasingly circumscribed by legal restrictions on coverage of certain topics and "voluntary" self-regulation. Thus, the Media Council, created in 1983, has upheld the principle of self-censorship in reporting. In a September 1984 ruling against the Pretoria News, the Council stated that a newspaper has a responsibility to base comment only on "true facts" to ensure fair reporting. The Government has restricted the areas on which the press may report. Among the proscribed areas are energy supplies, including petroleum and nuclear energy, and protection of "official secrets". In May 1984, the South African Government announced its willingness to relax the provisions of the Prisons Act governing press coverage of prison conditions. In addition to restrictive legislation, the Government occasionally takes direct action to suppress press activities, including banning newspapers and journalists. In late September 1984, the police searched the offices of Afrascope, an independent film organization, seized videotapes and other material and subsequently detained a staffer. Except for newspapers, direct government censorship of all publications, films and public entertainment is authorized by the Publications Act of 1974. In November the government subpoenaed 15 journalists in connection with its investigations of township unrest.

Television and radio are not directly censored, but these media are government monopolies. Reports and comments opposed to the Government, while permitted, are limited and controlled. Such controls and the tenor of government media are matters of widely critical comment in the press. The government-appointed Publications Committee established by the Publications Act may prohibit the distribution or possession of publications, films or other public entertainment that in its view is "obscene" or "blasphemous" (interpreted more broadly than in the U.S.); brings any section of the public into ridicule; harms relations between sections of the public; or is prejudicial to the safety of the State. Decisions of the Publications Committee may be appealed to the government-appointed Publications Appeal Board, but not to the courts. During 1984, the Publications Appeal Board adopted a more relaxed attitude toward censorship, lifting, for example, in January 1984 the ban on the Freedom Charter, a document outlining African nationalist principles. Also, in August the Board overturned a decision by the Publications Committee to ban the Windhoek Observer because of its alleged anti-government activities, and its disregard of censorship laws.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of association is regulated by a complex set of laws which prescribe separate schools, residential areas, and public facilities for different racial groups and prohibit interracial sex or marriage. In addition, the Political Interference Act of 1968 makes it unlawful for a person of one racial group to join a political party which has members of another racial group; to participate in an election campaign for a person of another racial group; or to address a group for the purpose of promoting a political party. However, the opposition Progressive Federal Party announced in September 1984 its intention to open the party to members of all racial groups in defiance of the Political Interference Act.

The Internal Security Act obstructs freedom of assembly as it gives magistrates the power to prohibit gatherings under certain conditions, to impose conditions on the holding of meetings, and to close off areas to the public to prevent prohibited gatherings. In response to widespread unrest in 1976, the Minister of Justice banned all outdoor gatherings except sports or specially authorized meetings. Though originally invoked for a one-year period, the ban has been renewed each succeeding year and is still in effect. In August 1984, following unrest surrounding the colored parliamentary elections, the Minister banned all indoor meetings of a political nature, except those held by officially recognized political parties. The ban remained in effect until the first session of the new Parliament ended at the end of September. Leaders of the election boycott campaign were detained after staging peaceful protests on the day of the colored elections.

With regard to labor unions, the Labor Relations Act in principle allows total freedom of association. However, this principle does not as yet apply across the board. The mining sector is covered by the Mines and Works Act which still contains certain racially based employment criteria. More than two million agricultural and domestic workers are not covered at all. Problems still exist with the issue of union registration under the Act. However, the number of negotiated wage settlements continued to increase, providing greater leverage by non-whites in the nation's economic life. In a milestone case, the National Union of Mineworkers staged the first legal strike by a union of black mineworkers in September 1984 when negotiations with the Chamber of Mines reached a stalemate. The strike ended after one day when a negotiated wage settlement was reached. Workers of all races are prohibited by law from picketing. Aside from the National Union of Mineworkers strike, virtually all strikes have been illegal, but the Government has not usually prosecuted leaders in the vast majority of strike incidents. As noted in section 1(f), in September 1984 the Government abolished colored job reservation in the Western Cape.

As of June 30, 1984, 18 black trade unionists were detained. An unknown number of black trade unionists are presently serving jail sentences. Two trade unionists remain banned. Moreover, in the wake of a successful November 5-6 politically inspired protest work "stayaway" (the word strike was never used), in which 7 trade union organizations participated jointly with a broad-based political opposition front, 21 more trade unionists were detained, including the leaders of the two most prominent black trade union confederations, some of whom were subsequently released. Thousands of workers at the Government's SASOL fuel plant were fired for participating in the politically oriented stayaway.

Contact with international labor groupings and other national labor centers, including United States labor organizations, is monitored but allowed. Foreign trade unionists wishing to visit South Africa sometimes encounter visa problems. Some South African trade unionists wishing to travel abroad have been refused passports.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of worship is generally respected. Religious organizations are allowed to hold meetings and other activities without interference as long as they do not seriously challenge government policies. As with other aspects of South African life, churches are often divided along racial lines, but many churches (including a growing number of white churches) do challenge apartheid as a matter of theological doctrine. Church groups are very active in urging either support for or opposition to the new Constitution. Effective January 1, 1984, amendments to the Defense Act provide, for the first time, alternative service options for religious objectors to National Military Service. Conscientious objectors on non-religious grounds continue to be subject to a maximum six-year sentence for refusing to serve.

Government ministers often criticize the South African Council of Churches (SACC) and its General Secretary, Anglican Bishop and Nobel Peace Prize laureate, Desmond Tutu. During 1984 the South African Government released its report of an investigation of the SACC. The report was critical of some activities such as poor administration of funds and support of "confrontationist" bodies; but despite SACC fears, the Government has taken no action against the organization. Some clergymen who actively oppose government policy have previously been banned, but a prominent critic, Reverend Beyers Naude, was unbanned in 1984.

d. Freedom of Movement within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

White South Africans, other than banned persons, must obtain permits to visit some black areas, but are otherwise free to move about the country. Whites must possess valid travel documents in order to travel abroad and to emigrate legally. Legal restrictions exist for Asians who wish to reside in or visit the Orange Free State and certain parts of the Natal Province. These restrictions are lifted only with special permission.

The influx control, or "pass law," system is described in Section 1 (f) of this report.

A citizen's access to a South African passport has been declared a privilege, not a right. According to a court ruling in 1982, the Minister of Home Affairs has an "unchallenged right to revoke" a passport without "ascribing any reasons for his action." The Government generally requires that an individual assigned to an "independent" homeland travel abroad on a homeland travel document. Since no country except South Africa recognizes the "independent" homelands as sovereign states, this negates the validity of such passports. Many blacks refuse invitations to travel abroad to avoid appearing to accept non-South African citizenship through acceptance of a homeland passport. Through its restrictive passport policies, the Government has blocked or hampered the travel from South Africa of some participants in U.S. Government-funded programs or private activities taking place abroad.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

For many decades, South Africa's national democratic institutions were reserved for whites only. Under the new Constitution, which came into effect in September 1984, political participation at the national level is no longer strictly limited to white South Africans, but includes some representation for Asians and coloreds. However, national political rights for black South Africans, who comprise 73 percent of the population, continue to be denied. Under the terms of the new Constitution, all officially registered and recognized political parties may operate as freely as the ruling national party. Elections for the two new chambers of Parliament were held despite a boycott campaign led by the United Democratic Front and a relatively low level of participation through both failure to register and then low voter turnout.

SOUTH AFRICA

The new Constitution created a tricameral Parliament with racially based chambers for whites, coloreds, and Asians. Members for each house were elected on separate voter roles. Each chamber has primary responsibility for legislation affecting its own racial constituency. A strong executive, the State President, decides which issues of general concern should be treated by all chambers. He may ask the President's Council, a multi-racial consultative body, for an advisory opinion. The Supreme Court may review whether the State President followed prescribed procedures but may not pronounce on an issue itself. The leaders of the Asian and colored chambers became members of the State President's Cabinet for General Affairs, but they have no specific portfolio. The State President is elected by an electoral college containing 50 whites, 25 coloreds, and 13 Asians. The State President replaces the former Prime Minister and has the power to dissolve Parliament and to call new elections. The new Parliament sat for only an abbreviated session in September 1984. At the session, the members of the colored and Asian chambers were sworn in and the new State President was elected and inaugurated. The President's Council met the following week. Until the Parliament sits for a normal session beginning January 25, 1985, effectiveness of the new system remains unknown.

With the implementation of the new constitution, the South African Government was confronted with the issue of black political participation. Currently the Government requires that national-level black political aspirations be realized through the "homelands." Since 1970, all blacks have been considered to be citizens of one of 10 designated homelands, created by the Government and destined for eventual "independence." Each black is assigned to an ethnic group and to a homeland from birth regardless of whether the individual was born in, has lived in, or has ever visited that homeland. When a homeland becomes "independent," all blacks assigned to that homeland lose their South African citizenship and regain only the "citizenship" of the homeland. The South African Government stated in 1984 that it had no intention of abolishing the homeland system.

Nearly 10 million blacks live in townships near white urban areas. In 1983 the South African Government created a special cabinet committee to consider means for political participation by these blacks. The cabinet committee has held a number of publicized meetings with leaders of black homelands, both "independent" and "self-governing." While discussions have been confidential, the State President himself has pledged to find "suitable political mechanisms" acceptable to urban blacks and to pay special attention to the issue of black citizenship and nationality. How this might affect the denationalization of blacks by imposing homeland "citizenship" is not yet clear.

At present, urban blacks may participate in local elections for community council members who, in terms of the Black Local Authorities Act, exercise some limited control over township affairs. However, elections held in 1984 were heavily boycotted. The role of these local authorities is severely circumscribed by their continuing financial and administrative dependence on the South African Government. While the Black Local Authorities Act of 1982 raised the rights and responsibilities of these black municipal authorities to the status of white municipal governments, it did nothing to redress problems of credibility or inadequate financial resources. Town councils and councillors were the focus of much of the violence which occurred in black townships in September and October 1984 and which underscored the weakness of these local authorities. In October 1984, the Government authorized black local authorities to form their own police units responsible to the local level, rather than the South African police. This decision has met strong opposition within the black community.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

South Africa extends little or no cooperation to various United Nations bodies or private organizations, like Amnesty International, which investigate South Africa's human rights record. The International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) is permitted access to convicted security prisoners and visits them annually. The ICRC does not visit security prisoners sentenced to death because the South Africa Government refuses to permit the Committee to speak to the prisoners in private. The ICRC does make recommendations for improvements in prison conditions which have often been implemented. Access to most, but not all, security detainees is denied. In its 1984 report, Amnesty International expressed concern about the use of detention without trial and alleged torture and ill-treatment of political detainees, and also about the use of banning orders to restrict political opposition to the Government. In its 1984-85 report, Freedom House rates South Africa "partly free."

A number of South African organizations observe, report, and contest human rights violations in the country. Black political organizations are active in calling for a society based on internationally accepted principles of human rights. In June 1980, a Lawyers for Human Rights Association was formed to monitor and suggest changes in the human rights situation in South Africa. The multi-racial Black Sash organization reports extensively on the abuses of the influx control system, based on its experience in assisting blacks who have run afoul of the pass laws. The South African Council of Churches speaks out on a wide range of human rights issues and is active in assisting persons incarcerated under security laws and groups denied their human rights. The South African Institute of Race Relations (SAIRR) numbers among its activities the compilation of lists and statistical information on security detainees and banned persons. The SAIRR annual report is a primary source on questions of human rights in South Africa. The Detainees' Parents Support Committee also compiles statistics on persons detained under security legislation and provides support for families of detainees.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The South African economy is dualistic in nature, containing both a highly sophisticated modern sector and a large underdeveloped rural sector where the vast majority of people are engaged in simple subsistence agriculture. Virtually the entire white and Asian populations, and a significant proportion of the colored population, receive their income from the modern economy. Most of the economically active

SOUTH AFRICA

African population of approximately 7 million also participate in the "first world" economy, though generally at significantly lower rates or renumeration and skill/authority levels. However, various apartheid regulations ("influx control") effectively exclude many Africans from seeking opportunity in urban areas. Roughly half of the African population resides in the various homelands, which for the most part are resource-poor and lacking in job opportunities.

There has been considerable economic development in a few homeland areas, aided by several government decentralization programs. Nevertheless, subsistence agriculture, supplemented by remittances from relatives working in "white" South Africa, is the most prevalent source of livelihood. Since many, if not most, of the economically active males in the homelands seek employment in the modern sector of "white" South Africa, a disproportionate number of dependents (women, children, and the elderly) actually reside in the homelands. Over 60 percent of the population from 20-65 residing in the ten homelands is female. Though agricultural progress is being achieved in some rural black areas, the homelands as a whole do not produce enough food to feed their resident populations, despite government claims that the homelands are potentially self-sufficient agriculturally.

The South African economy has slowed perceptibly in the past three years, and was a factor in the 1984 unrest. The South African Government has estimated that an annual real growth of 5 to 6 percent is necessary for the economy to absorb the approximately 250,000 African entrants to the labor market each year. An even higher rate of growth would be necessary to reduce present black unemployment. However, there seems to be very little possibility of South Africa experiencing such growth in the foreseeable future. World Bank data indicate a relatively high per capita gross national product of $2,717 in 1983. Income distribution has traditionally been skewed along racial lines, though this phenomenon has diminished to some degree.

African unemployment is not measured directly. Government figures show an incease in unemployment among the economically active population throughout 1983 and 1984. This does not reflect conditions of unemployment and underemployment in the rural areas. The official unemployment rate among Africans was recorded at 8.0 percent (488,000 unemployed) in June 1984. As the economy continued to experience a downturn unemployment rose, generally a phenomenon more serious among the African population. Unemployment among whites is less than one percent and is only marginally higher among Asians and coloreds. Private estimates of total black unemployment (including the 10 homelands) range up to 25 percent or more.

A respected South African University study indicates that the black share of personal income has been rising slowly in recent years from 23 percent of the total in 1970 to 29 percent in 1980. A South African Government statistical survey conducted in 1983 found that the average salary for Africans has more than trebled since 1979 while white average earnings have not quite doubled in the same period. An average African salary, it found, is around $145 per month while the average colored person takes home $192, and the average Indian $270. Whites, on the other hand, have an average monthly salary of just more than $550. An African worker in the mines earns an average of $136 a month; his colored colleague earns an average of $235, Indians are paid $380, and whites $750. The white/black wage gap is slightly wider in the public service than in the private sector as a whole (including all homelands), where the black average is $137 a month as opposed to a white average of $510.

According to the World Bank, the South African population was 31,698,000 in 1984 with an overall growth rate of 2.4 percent. The most recent census of the country's population, taken in 1980, records average annual population growth rates by racial groups from 1970 to 1980 as: whites, 1.7 percent; coloreds, 2.2 percent; Asians, 2.4 percent; and Africans, 2.7 percent. Official World Bank statistics indicate an overall infant mortality rate of 87.9 per 1,000 live births in 1984. Official government statistics on infant mortality by racial group in 1978 were: whites 14.9; coloreds, 80.6; and Asians, 25.3. Records for Africans are incomplete, but estimates of infant mortality among this sector of the population range up to more than 200 per 1,000 live births, especially in rural homelands such as Ciskei. The higher rate of infant mortality among Africans is ascribed largely to poor sanitary conditions and low standards of nutrition. These factors, combined with the lack of sufficient hospitals and doctors for blacks, especially in the African homelands, account for the differences in life expectancy among the different population groups. World Bank statistics for 1980 show a life expectancy of 64.1 years for all South Africans. A 1983 South African Government report indicates whites have a life expectancy of 70.3 years, Asians 65 years, coloreds 59 years, and Africans 57.5 years.

The drought experienced in South Africa over the past three years has exacerbated the problem of malnutrition among Africans, especially children. A respected university study done in 1981--before the drought became serious--found 2.9 million children (mostly Africans) suffering from at least mild forms of malnutrition. As the drought has continued, the situation has deteriorated. The South African Government has provided drought relief of $20 million to the African homelands and is currently spending $13 million for short-term job creation to combat the effects of the recession and the drought. Many government critics believe these amounts fall far short of what is necessary and have called upon the government to provide money for emergency feeding schemes. Private relief organizations are currently feeding approximately one million people at a cost of over $200,000 per month.

The most recent World Bank data available indicate that as of 1960, 57 percent of the adult population of South Africa was literate. Since for whites, coloreds, and Asians, school attendance is compulsory, it is likely that virtually all adult members of these groups are literate. Some surveys have claimed that 50-60 percent of all adult Africans are literate. Such findings are difficult to corroborate given the rural nature of so much of the African population and disagreement over standards used to gauge literacy. In 1981 African pupil enrollment was just over five million in regular primary through high school grades. Only slightly more than one percent of enrollment was in the last grade of high school, illustrative of a high drop-out rate. A private study indicted that of African school-leavers, some 54 percent departed prior to achieving literacy.

SOUTH AFRICA

Under the new Constitution, education is an "own" affair with whites, coloreds, and Asians having separate departments and ministers of education. African education is separate from these three departments and the South African Government has until recently steadfastly resisted the idea of a single educational system for all. The Department of Cooperation, Development and Education recently stated that the new Department of National Education is the central education department recommended by the DeLange Commission on Education, with the duty to prescribe general education policy and standards for all population groups. Within the present system, the Government has been devoting dramatically increased funds for educating blacks. The Government states that the budget for black education increased from $35 million in 1972 to $354 million in 1984 (not constant dollars). There remains, however, a huge disparity between spending on blacks as opposed to whites, with the Government spending approximately $7 on each white student for every $1 spent on each African student.

The South African Institute of Race Relations estimates per capita spending on education as $692 for whites, $436 for Asians, $296 for coloreds and $96 for Africans. These figures only apply in "white" areas. Amounts spent in the homelands are even lower. Student/teacher ratios are 18.2 for whites, 23.6 for Asians. 26.7 for coloreds and 42.7 for blacks in "white" South Africa. In the homelands the ratios vary from 31.9 to 49.7 Nevertheless, the trend is toward a narrower gap in expenditure and educational opportunities for all racial groups. Starting in 1981, free compulsory education up to the fourth grade began to be gradually introduced for Africans. It is now in effect at 250 schools with a total of 100,000 students affected. African enrollment at "white" universities (for subjects not offered in the largely segregated black universities) has been growing slowly but substantially.

South Africa suffers from a housing shortage that continues to worsen. The African population is the hardest hit. Early in 1982, a South African Government department announced that almost 120,000 housing units would have to be built annually in "white" South Africa to overcome the shortage within ten years. For Africans alone, the Department said some 52,000 units would be needed every year. The situation in the homelands is worse, yet the amount spent on housing in South Africa dropped from 2.7 percent of GDP in 1970 to 2.3 percent in 1980. A one-year program to sell 500,000 government-owned houses (most of which are occupied by Africans) at discounts of up to 40 percent begun in July 1983, has been extended beyond its original one year and will continue until July 1985. During the first 14 months of the program, however, only 32,000 homes were sold. The sale of houses was universally welcomed, but many government critics are disappointed that the Government has refused to grant freehold rights to Africans. The granting of 99-year leasehold rights (which are now renewable) to some blacks is a sign that freehold may be forthcoming.

Women in South Africa suffer legal, cultural, and economic discrimination, most of which is based on tradition rather than codified in law. The latest South African statistics show that women constitute 41.1 percent of the workforce, but only hold 12 percent of managerial positions. Women traditionally earn lower wages than men. Women are politically underrepresented. No women presently serve as ministers in the Government. Two members of the President's Council are women. Only 3 of the 178 "white" parliamentary seats are occupied by women; 9 women stand alongside 167 men on provincial councils. During 1984, women's organizations actively supported female candidates at local levels with moderate success. Maternity benefits are not quaranteed; a pregnant woman can legally be dismissed from her job. Abortion is illegal. No fertility/contraceptive legislation exists. Until 1984, married female teachers were discriminated against in terms of job placement and pay. New legislation will gradually phase out quotas in school faculty hiring practices; previously 40 percent of all jobs were reserved for men, even if no qualified men were available. Married women will now compete equally with single women teachers. The legislation supports equity of pay for teachers, but tradition dictates that men receive higher salaries because they probably support families.

One important change in the status of women in South Africa in 1984 was passage of the Matrimonial Property Act, which abolishes the marital power of the husband. All marriages will automatically occur in community of property unless an antenuptial contract establishes a different financial relationship. The accrual system will be used for marriages in community of property, so that a wife may share in the accrued assets of the marriage at its dissolution. Married women may now enter contractual arrangements on their own merit. The legislation's one major drawback is that it applies only to white, colored and Asian women, although a parliamentary committee promises to examine the possibility of extending its provisions to black women as well.

While sexual discrimination in South Africa tends to cut across racial distinctions, black women continue to suffer more than white, colored, and Asian women. Domestic workers, most of whom are black, are not protected by minimum wage laws and do not qualify for sick leave or maternity benefits. The Machinery and Occupational Safety Act, passed in early 1984, will extend to domestic workers who may claim some compensation from the employer for injuries sustained on the job. Changes in black taxation that took effect in February hit black married women harder than men. Married black women may pay as much as three times more tax than married men, as they are taxed at a higher rate. Black women are perpetual minors before the law. The Government's failure to extend the Matrimonial Property Act to black women has drawn heavy criticism from blacks and whites. Black women are also severely limited in their ability to own property and rent accommodations in urban areas where they find employment. Increasingly, black women are turning to jobs previously held by men, such as trenchdigging, because they can earn a bit more than as domestic worker.

Against this background of traditional discrimination, a nascent women's rights movement has taken root in South Africa. Women's organizations, very often multiracial, have been at the forefront of the struggle for civil rights, on the premise that civil rights for all must ultimately mean equality for women.

NAMIBIA

Namibia is a former Germany colony occupied and administered by the Republic of South Africa since 1915, with a League of Nations mandate from 1920-1966. Today, South Africa illegally administers Namibia through an appointed Administrator General who exercises executive power. He has the authority to issue proclamations with the force of law. Under the Administrator, or "first-tier" central government level, there are: "second-tier" authorities--separate ethnic governing bodies representing each of the 10 officially designated population groups except the Bushmen--who exercise semiautonomous authority in areas determined by the Administrator General; and "third-tier" authorities, such as municipal governments and village management boards, who are limited to providing local services. Not all the ethnic authorities have equal power, and under this three-tier system, whites receive a disproportionate share of resources. Official commissions have criticized this three-tier structure for corruption and inefficiency.

Just over a million persons live in Namibia, more than half of them in two provinces along the northern border with Angola: Ovamboland and Kavango. The Ovambo ethnic group comprises 47 percent of Namibia's population. Even so, the old colonial boundaries divide the Ovambo. Almost a third of them live in southern Angola. Namibia's northeastern corner receives plentiful rainfall, but during only one season. Elsewhere, the country is generally arid; the Namib desert covers the southwestern region and the entire western coast.

The judiciary in Namibia consists of two overlapping systems: one for whites, "westernized" blacks, and persons of mixed race; the other for indigenous Africans. Wide-ranging security legislation largely parallels that enacted in South Africa.

The denial of the right to exercise self-rule in Namibia continues. In 1966, the United Nations revoked South Africa's mandate over Namibia, originally granted by the League of Nations in the aftermath of World War I. However, South Africa has refused to relinquish its jurisdiction, even after the International Court of Justice in 1971 upheld U.N. authority over Namibia, determined that South Africa's presence there was illegal, and stated that South Africa was obligated to withdraw its administration from Namibia immediately.

In 1978, the five Western nations of the United Nations Security Council worked out a proposal for Namibian independence with South Africa, neighboring states, and SWAPO--the South West Africa People's Organization--which has been fighting a guerrilla war with South Africa since 1966. The proposal was presented and approved as United Nations Security Council Resolution 435. It calls for the cessation of all hostilities, free elections under the supervision of the United Nations, and the phased withdrawal of South African armed forces.

Negotiations since 1978 have focused on issues connected with the implementation of the U.N. Plan, e.g., agreement in 1981 on assurances regarding U.N. impartiality in supervising elections in Namibia. Since 1983, the principal issue has been the position of South Africa that it will not agree to implement the U.N. independence plan for Namibia until it has a satisfactory commitment on the withdrawal of Cuban troops from neighboring Angola. In November 1984, the Angolan Government made a formal proposal on Cuban troop withdrawal within the context of an overall regional settlement, including the implementation of Resolution 435 on Namibian independence. South Africa has responded with proposals of its own. The U.S. has been playing a mediating role in order to facilitate an agreement resulting in the implementation of Resolution 435.

Meanwhile Namibia continues to experience low-level guerrilla conflict with insurgents of SWAPO's military branch, the People's Liberation Army of Namibia (PLAN), fighting the South African Defense Forces (SADF) and the South West Africa Territorial Force (SWATF). SWAPO draws its strength principally from within the Ovambo people. The bulk of the insurgency and counter-insurgency effort occurs in Ovamboland and Kavango, but sporadic violence erupts throughout the country.

Namibia's economy relies principally on mining, farming, and fishing. Tourism is an emerging revenue-earner. The white minority controls each of these sectors, with the exception of traditional agriculture, and much of the revenue generated has made its way back to the Republic of South Africa in the form of corporate profits and stockholder dividends. However, the South African Government has viewed Namibia as a major drain on its budget.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Charges that South African police and security forces commit murder continue to be made by lawyers, journalists, and political figures, as well as SWAPO. A leader of the Namibian Christian Democratic Party called a news conference in late August and named five residents who, he said, had been killed by SADF/SWATF forces in Kavango. A number of clergymen, journalists, and the Bar Council of South-West Africa have also made accusations of murder against Koevoet, the special South African police unit assigned to track SWAPO in the northern operational area. South African authorities say that they investigate each allegation and prosecute offenders if the necessary evidence exists. Some witnesses are, however, reportedly reluctant to come forward, for fear of retaliation by security forces.

The SADF blamed SWAPO forces for 28 murders between January and June 1984. SADF records cite the dates, times, and locations of each incident. A spokesman for the SADF said that such incidents had greatly decreased in the past several years. According to its records, 91 civilians had been killed by land mine or assassinations in 1983, compared with over 100 each in the years 1982 and 1981.

In support of its contention that SWAPO has changed to a policy of indiscriminate mining of roads, government forces report that SWAPO land mines killed 33 civilians from January-August 1984. Black leaders recognize that mining is often indiscriminate but note that some people believe such casualties are an unfortunate but acceptable byproduct of efforts to hit defense force targets.

The level of insurgent attacks on urban areas increased in the operational area during 1984. Mechanically detonated limpet mines and occasional mortar attacks on populated areas resulted in a number of deaths and injuries and considerable property damage. One small device exploded in Windhoek itself with little or no damage.

b. Disappearance

Disappearances continue to be a regular occurrence in Namibia. The Government habitually withholds information on individuals it detains under security legislation, making it difficult for families to locate missing relatives. This blurs the distinction between disappearances and detentions, at least temporarily.

South African security forces figures list 34 civilians abducted by SWAPO in the first 10 months of 1984 and 278 persons during all of 1983. The SADF claims that SWAPO relies on such abductions to provide recruits for its military wing, but that the organization is abandoning the practice because of concern for its domestic image. SWAPO maintains that its recruits join voluntarily.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

A number of internal Namibian political leaders, as well as some clergymen, report that security forces in the operational area, and Koevoet in particular, employ ruthless methods to extract information and discourage sympathy for SWAPO. Suspected SWAPO agents, it is said, undergo brutal treatment from their interrogators, and SWAPO guerrillas seem never to be brought to trial. They are either killed, interned under very harsh conditions, or join the security forces--usually Koevoet.

Police and military insist they investigate all allegations but that victims are required to step forward and press charges. Critics respond that victims are too afraid to testify against elements they believe will exact retribution. Indeed, in a November 1983 court case, a police officer refused to testify against Koevoet, claiming that he feared he would be killed in retaliation.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Administrator General's proclamation AG-9 designates "security districts" in Namibia where authorities have the right to detain individuals indefinitely, and without explanation or trial, for renewable 30-day periods. This proclamation is reinforced by other security legislation, such as AG-26 which permits detention for indefinite periods. Security districts include Windhoek and certain areas to the north, among them Ovamboland and Kavango. This legislation is used relatively often and indiscriminately, and the Government often refuses to disclose even the names of those it has detained. On June 9, 1984, the Government took into custody 37 leading members of SWAPO's internal organization who had gathered for a barbecue to celebrate the earlier release of 54 detainees from an internment camp in Namibia. The move came during then Prime Minister P.W. Botha's European tour and was well publicized as a result. The 37 reportedly were held in solitary confinement for several days, in 5 different detention camps as much as 300 kilometers apart, before being released on their own recognizance. The Government later dropped all charges.

A better known use of AG-9 involved the Keikanachab camp outside the city of Mariental, where until 1984 the Government held 146 prisoners, including 14 Angolans, most of whom had been captured in a raid on SWAPO bases near Cassinga, Angola, in 1978. In March, 3 prominent clergymen were among a group of applicants who brought suit against the authorities to obtain the release of 37 prisoners they had been able to identify. The Government was able to have the suit summarily dismissed, using a section of the South African Defense Act. But on May 24, the Angolans and 55 of the other Mariental detainees were released. On October 11, the camp's only woman detainee was released, and on October 18, 74 of the known 75 remaining prisoners were released in Ovamboland where they had been flown to undergo an orientation course on how society had changed since their internment. Military officials said the men no longer posed a threat to security. One man, Petrus Haimbodi, was not released, though he was transferred out of Keikanachab. The authorities described Haimbodi as a "trained SWAPO guerrilla" who still represented a security threat. Another unidentified man, one of the original detainees, is apparently not at Mariental but is unaccounted for.

Other Namibians remain in detention, including Immanuel Moongo, who was detained under AG-9 on September 6, 1983, and Boas Mwendelili, reportedly detained on the same day. The Government declines to provide detailed information on him or other detainees, including their precise whereabouts. The Government repeatedly refused to allow attorneys access to the Mariental detainees.

Some detainees are released and placed under restricted conditions, as under the South African Internal Security Act. Such restrictions can vary with each individual but usually prohibit meetings with more than four other individuals and entail strict curfew hours. Restricted persons must be home, alone, between 8 p.m. and 6 a.m. There are no available statistics on the numbers of persons affected by this practice. A SWAPO Vice President, Nathaniel Maxwilili, remains under restriction in Walvis Bay. He received permission to attend the May 1984 meeting in Lusaka of SWAPO, the Administrator General, and parties in the Multi-Party Conference.

According to the Department of Justice, 21 Namibians are still imprisoned in the Republic of South Africa on Robben Island, which is reserved for political prisoners. In April, the South African Government released Andimba (Herman) Toivo Ja Toivo, a cofounder of SWAPO, from Robben Island, where he had been imprisoned for 16 years. Following his release, he was reelected secretary general of the party. In June, the Government released 15 other Namibian prisoners from Robben Island. Almost all had been serving sentences of 8 to 20 years after being found guilty of violations of the Terrorism Act.

In September 1983, the Administrator General announced that a commission of inquiry would be established to make recommendations on the "adequacy, fairness, and efficacy of legislation pertaining to the internal security of Namibia." The Commission gathered evidence throughout the country in 1984. Its sessions have been in camera, however, and it is not known when the Commission's final report will be released.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Those persons detained under AG-9 and other pieces of security legislation have no recourse to the courts. The South African Government, as noted, effectively blocked a suit on behalf of 37 Mariental AG-9 detainees by resorting to the Defense Act. That Act enables the authorities to quash any court action by issuing a certification barring continuation of the trial. Only two criteria are required: 1) it must be in the national interest to discontinue the proceeding; 2) the certificate must be issued in "good faith" for the purpose of prevention or suppression of terrorism in an operational area (i.e., area of insurgency).

With this exception, persons brought to court can expect a hearing based on the legal merits of their case. They have access to effective counsel, and charges against them are clearly stated at the time of arraignment. All cases are tried in civilian courts since no state of war has been formally declared.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Politically active Namibians, including journalists, clergymen, and political figures, report that surveillance by the authorities is routine, whether of their mail, telephone lines, or casual conversations. AG-9 confers virtually unlimited powers of search and seizure on security forces in security zones. In the operational area, invasion of the home is said to be commonplace. Visiting clergymen report that their vehicles have been stopped and all occupants forced to undergo body searches. They say even religious pamphlets have been confiscated. Throughout Namibia, the provisions of security legislation take precedence over other legal requirements for warrants to search private homes.

In a 1971 advisory opinion, the International Court of Justice found that South Africa's administration of Namibia "based on grounds of race, color, descent, or national or ethnic origin" was a "denial of fundamental human rights" and "a flagrant violation of the purposes and principles of the United Nations charter."

In 1977, the appointment of Judge T. Marthinus Steyn as Administrator General resulted in the easing of apartheid in Namibia. The Immorality and Mixed Marriages Acts were repealed, pass laws were abolished, and the restrictions on the movement of labor were greatly relaxed. There is noticeably less segregation in most parts of Namibia than in South Africa. Still, de facto segregation endures. Some white toughs forcibly discourage non-white use of a swimming pool in a largely white residential area of Windhoek. A barber shop in downtown Windhoek discourages black clientele. Although restaurants and hotels are officially open to all races, the right of equal admission is often not enforced in less than deluxe establishments.

Furthermore, in the areas of most direct importance to the majority of the population--schools and hospitals--services are still supplied by separate ethnic second-tier governments. The effect is that whites with a much higher tax base have access to first-rate hospitals and an underutilized teacher training college, while various black groups obtain distinctly inferior and overcrowded services. In addition, some facilities directly administered by the South African Government, such as the railroads, are still segregated.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

South Africa's stringent press laws extend to Namibia. They greatly restrict reporting on a wide variety of matters such as prisons, military affairs, detentions, energy, and security affairs. Opinion and editorial writing is less restricted, and even published comment that is favorable to SWAPO is tolerated. Within the legal parameters, the Namibian press has regularly embarrassed the Government with reports of malfeasance and corruption. One newspaper in particular, the Windhoek Observer, was renowned for its vigorous and independent reporting on human rights violations. The Government banned specific issues and, on August 15, a committee of the South African Directorate for Publications banned all future editions of the Observer, effectively closing it down. The committee's grounds were that the Observer had violated sections of the Publications Act making it unlawful to publish material which is "indecent or obscene or offensive to the public morals," or material which is "prejudicial to the safety of the state, the general welfare, or the peace or good order." Several weeks later, the South African Publications Appeal Board unbanned the newspaper, but warned its publishers that some of the newspaper's material was "on the verge of a contravention of the Publication Act."

The Observer has now adopted a more cautious editorial policy. Its outspoken political editor Gwen Lister was demoted and, after many of the staff quit in protest, she resigned. In December she was charged with violation of the Post Office Act and the Secrecy Act, when she showed members of the press a top secret letter from the police in Pretoria to the postmaster in Windhoek ordering surveillance of her mail. She had discovered the letter in her postal box. As of mid-December, her case had not yet come to trial.

Since the Observer banning, the Government has raised the security deposit required of all newspaper publishers from $10,000 to $20,000. The deposit effectively discourages new newspapers from being launched and also tends to inhibit publishers from edging too close to the boundaries of Namibian journalism, for fear of forfeiting their deposits.

All publications banned in South Africa are also banned in Namibia, and the possession of such literature is grounds for prosecution. A Namibian journalist appeared in a South African court in May 1984 under charges brought after South African airport police discovered that she was carrying publications which were on the banned list. She was subsequently acquitted May 7, using the defense that since so many publications were banned, it was not possible to know which ones could be legally held. The magistrate said prosecutors had not proven that she knowingly committed a crime.

NAMIBIA

Although South Africa's censorship law extends to Namibian territory, its enforcement by the Namibian Attorney General is somewhat less stringent than in South Africa.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The 1981 "Prohibition and Notification of Meetings Act," Administrator General Proclamation AG 170, places restrictions on political parties' meetings and requires political parties to abjure violence or the taking up of arms to effect political change. According to this law, meetings are not prevented in advance, but prosecutions can result from violations. The number of actual prosecutions is unknown.

In addition, leaders of a breakaway faction of the Southwest Africa National Union (SWANU) complained that in late 1984 their party members had been stopped and harassed by the security forces while en route to meetings. They report that their members were questioned about their support of one set of SWANU leaders over the leaders who advocate membership in the Multi-Party Congress, which has the support of the South African Government.

Namibia's six labor unions are all registered and all nominally non-racial, although only the mine workers union has a sizable black membership. Only the mine workers union and the municipal workers union, which is basically for white-collar workers, can be considered functioning employee organizations. The mine workers union, however, is represented in only one of the three mining firms. As in South Africa, strikes in Namibia are legal, but the machinery for handling disputes is so cumbersome that it is never used. Strikes are, therefore, invariably of the wildcat variety. Black labor militancy is not evident. Most large-scale employers, even in the fishing industry, use migrant workers who live in compounds controlled by management. This arrangement, combined with the employers' extremely paternalistic attitude toward the workers, contributes to workers' relative passivity.

c. Freedom of Religion

Namibians enjoy full freedom of religion. Most are Christians. Sects represented include Lutherans, Roman Catholics, Anglicans, and a number of other religious denominations.

Many clergymen, however, complain that the authorities harass them, because the Government believes they favor SWAPO and because of their statements critical of the continued South African presence in Namibia. Clergymen report that, during visits into the operational area, their vehicles have been stopped, every occupant, including clergymen, searched, and printed materials of a purely religious nature confiscated. The Lutheran Church figures prominently in reports of harassment. The Church has charged that on August 2 an eyewitness observed members of the South African Defense Force (SADF) planting a land mine outside their mission hospital at Onipa in the operational area. The authorities say the police found a detonator buried on the hospital grounds, but they deny that the SADF had placed it there.

Non-Namibian church groups opposed to South African occupation and administration visit regularly. The South African Council of Churches completed a fact-finding tour of Namibia in early October. In July, the South African Government initially refused to issue passports to three Namibian church officials who wished to attend the Lutheran World Assembly in Budapest, but ultimately granted a travel document to one. The military conscription system, fully activated in October, makes no provision for conscientious objectors.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Pass laws have been abolished in Namibia, so movement within the country is much freer than in South Africa. In the northern operational area, however, curfews and checkpoints severely restrict freedom of movement. In addition, the fear of land mines and SWAPO violence also restricts travel in this area. One journalist said he drives only after 10 a.m. and before 4 p.m., after the roads have been swept for mines and before the approaching twilight lends cover to guerrillas.

No ethnic groups have been resettled in recent years. In November, the 900 members of the Riemvasmakers Community petitioned the Administrator General to be resettled in northern Namibia from their current home in Damaraland. The petition said their livestock had been killed off by drought and wild animals, and they were finding it increasingly difficult to find jobs. The Riemvasmakers fled from Namibia to the Cape Province at the turn of the century. They were resettled in Damaraland in 1974.

In early June 1984, the paramount chief of the Herero ethnic group said progress had been made during talks with the Government on the possible resettlement of 30,000 Hereros living in Botswana. Chief Kuaima Riruako held talks in Windhoek with the Administrator General regarding these Hereros, many of whom trace their ancestry to Hereros forced out of South West Africa after the failed Herero uprising in 1904-1905 against the German administration.

In August, the press reported on government plans to convert into a nature conservation area some 6,000 square miles in which a part of the Bushman ethnic group, the Ju/Wasi, maintain a traditional way of life. Critics of the Government denounced the move as a harsh and unnecessary encroachment on the Ju/Wasi's traditional culture and economic existence. They noted that the Ju/Wasi had been deprived in 1970 of 70 percent of their land, and that many have been forced to exist on the fringes of modern society, dependent upon handouts from the Government and on remittances from those relatives who have cash-paying jobs. The Government responded that the conservation area contains rare species and that the conversion of the area would provide jobs for the Bushmen, while still permitting them to use their own methods for gathering food. As of November, a final decision on the conservation area had not been made.

Travel abroad is strictly controlled by government authorities. By law, all who leave South Africa or Namibia must have a passport or "travel document." The Government often declines to issue such documents to Namibians suspected of pro-SWAPO leanings, or who are officially associated with SWAPO. SWAPO leader Andimba Toivo Ja Toivo was issued an "open" passport, which enabled him to travel anywhere, after traveling frequently on a more restricted travel document.

NAMIBIA

All persons entering South Africa or Namibia must have a passport and visa unless they can prove to be Namibian or South African by law or descent.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The right of citizens to change their Government is non-existent in Namibia. The Administrator General wields full executive power. Nevertheless, despite the application of security restrictions to control political activity as noted above, significant political activity continues. SWAPO has an internal wing that is cautiously active in Windhoek.

There are some 44 political organizations in Namibia, several of which have only a handful of members. The organizations range from modern parties to traditional groups based on ethnicity. Two key groups--a breakaway faction of the Southwest Africa National Union (SWANU) and the Damara Council--have formed a political alliance with SWAPO, which they call the "Patriotic Front."

The announcement this year that all Namibians would be required to enlist for military service, which could require that they fight to maintain South African rule, caused a widespread outcry. The status of the registration drive was unclear as of mid-December, after questions were raised about its legal basis. Some 14,000 men were already registered, many under threat of firing by their employers. There was no official announcement that registration would cease.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Critics of the human rights situation in Namibia make regular trips there. In October, a delegation of bishops from the South African Council of Churches made a fact-finding tour of Namibia, which included a visit to the northern area where insurgency and counterinsurgency actions are most active. Their report has yet to be issued, but there are indications that it will be critical of current South African policy. The closing of the Windhoek Observer, an important source of information on allegations of human rights violations, was widely attributed to its critical reporting on controversial issues, including human rights. Amnesty International in its 1984 report (covering 1983) noted the detention without trial of political detainees and the allegations that some of them were tortured and ill-treated. In its 1984-85 Report, Freedom House rates Namibia "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The population of Namibia is roughly 1.07 million: 7 percent white and 93 percent black. The population growth rate was 3 percent in 1984. Life expectancy at birth is approximately 61 years, and the infant mortality rate (1984) is 112.3 per 1,000 live births. Calorie supply as a percentage of requirements was 95.75 percent in 1977, the most recent year for which data are available. Literacy figures (1983) are 100 percent for whites and 28 percent for blacks, with school attendance 100 percent for whites and 16 percent for blacks. In 1982, per capita gross national product was about $1,935, with distribution of income heavily skewed in favor of the white population.

NAMIBIA

Western culture predominates among Africans living in urban areas and among the many migratory workers. But in the more isolated rural areas traditional society remains relatively intact. Many of the differences in the quality of life are due to the administration of important government services, particularly health and education, by the ethnically based second-tier governments. This inefficient system of government perpetuates qualitative and quantitative differences in government resources and services provided to white and black Namibians.

Namibia enjoys a sophisticated and extensive physical infrastructure. A modern economy, in which most whites participate and which produces most of the wealth, co-exists with a traditional, subsistence, agriculturally based economy, which supports most of the labor force. A large majority of the blacks are in the subsistence economy, although many blacks are employed in the modern sector, mainly at lower levels. Both sectors of Namibia's economy are based heavily on natural resources, i.e., fishing, mining, and farming, which were battered during 1984. Large sections of Namibia's waters are overfished by foreign fleets which operate unlicensed and unchecked. Mineral prices and revenue are depressed, and massive capital infusions are needed to overhaul the mining infrastructure. Namibians fear that their natural resources are being depleted by South African and other foreign firms. Profits from entrepreneurial ventures are transferred outside the country, whether in the form of stockholder dividends or direct corporate transfers. New investment is impeded due to uncertainty over Namibia's future. Many of the whites, who control the modern economy, including South African civil servants, have a limited commitment to Namibia's future. Most have assets and potential jobs outside the country--often in South Africa--which they can fall back on should circumstances require their leaving Namibia.

An estimated 70 percent of the population rely on subsistence farming in the traditional sector, and another 10 percent on modern commercial farming. Both sectors have been affected by the current drought, which is considered the worst since World War II and has resulted in hunger in a number of areas, including Kaokoland in the northwest.

South Africa has, according to government officials, guaranteed more than $90 million in loans in 1984 alone and provided more than $325 million annually in direct aid to Namibia. Namibia also derives about $75 million annually from the South African Customs and Excise Union.

Women face considerable discrimination in Namibia, under both South African law and local tradition. There is no clear and consistent policy on which dictates are invoked in any given circumstance. Under traditional rural custom, the woman is usually the ward of either her father or, if she is married, her husband. She is never independent. Women in higher socio-economic groups reportedly elude such straight categorization, but even in the modern sector, some married women complain that they are unable to borrow money or own property without their husband's approval. Women tend to be subject to salary discrimination as well. One leading female political figure said in October that women's political groups seem to be emerging, though they are very much in the nascent stage.

SUDAN

Jaafar Nimeiri came to power by military coup in 1969, and formally assumed the presidency in 1971, by means of a single candidate referendum. The President dominates all branches of government and is the leader of the Sudan Socialist Union, the sole political organization. He has periodically assumed ministerial appointments, currently is Minister of Defense and Chief of Staff of the Armed Forces, and is de facto Prime Minister. All judges are responsible to him for "proper performance" of their duties. He exercises oversight of the People's Assembly through his powers to appoint 10 percent of its membership, to convene and dissolve it, to rule by provisional decree during recesses (normally July-October), and to limit legislative inquiry into executive affairs.

Sudan has traditionally been a tolerant society, currently offering hospitality and protection to over 800,000 refugees of diverse religious and ethnic backgrounds from several neighboring countries. In 1984, however, controversy over religious law and insurgency in the south led to setbacks in human rights.

During 1984, President Nimeiri stepped up his program to Islamize Sudanese institutions. Laws Islamizing the military, civil transactions, the tax structure, and other areas were passed. Nimeiri had already promulgated new criminal, procedures, and judiciary codes under Islamization in late 1983. In 1984 Nimeiri also proposed a set of constitutional amendments which would have made Sudan an Islamic state and made the President the religious as well as the secular leader. The People's Assembly debated the amendments in July but adjourned without ratifying them.

In the 1972 Addis Ababa Accords, President Nimeiri brought an end to Sudan's 17-year civil war between the Muslim north and the largely non-Muslim south by granting the southern third of the country special regional autonomy. However, within the past 18 months, armed insurgency under the Sudan Peoples Liberation Movement has resumed in the south and escalated in scale in 1984 with an attendant increase in civilian casualties. The conflict was fueled by the President's decision to decentralize the south into three regions, which some southerners see as an infringement of the south's special autonomy, and aggravated by the program to Islamize Sudanese institutions, including installing summary justice. In September, President Nimeiri reversed direction and announced that he would accept reunification of the three regions if southerners can come to a consensus on a new regional government.

Following the Government's decision in 1983 to incorporate traditional Islamic punishments drawn from the Shari'a into the penal code, the President declared a state of emergency on April 29, in part to ensure that the Shari'a was applied more broadly, and he suspended most constitutionally guaranteed rights. Civilian courts, which had been slow to carry out amputations and other punishments, lost most of their jurisdiction over criminal cases. In their place, emergency courts, later known as "decisive justice courts," were established with summary jurisdiction over criminal cases. More than 50 public amputations for thievery took place during the emergency. Public lashings were common for misdemeanors. Public hangings for murder and in one case robbery took place. The new laws were not applied in the south, but were enforced against non-Muslims, including southerners, living in the north. On September 29, President Nimeiri announced the end of the state of emergency and dismantled the emergency courts, but soon promulgated a new judiciary act which perpetuated and institutionalized many of the summary practices of the emergency courts. Amputations and hangings continued after the state of emergency was lifted.

Sudan's relations with Libya have been strained for several years; Libyan leader Muammar Qadhafi has undertaken or backed several plots to overthrow the Government. On March 16, 1984, in an isolated incident, a Libyan airplane bombed Omdurman, killing five and injuring others. During 1984, Sudanese authorities apprehended a number of groups of Libyan-financed Sudanese subversives planning to overthrow the Government (the most recent being in October). Qadhafi has publicly expressed support for southern Sudanese insurgents. Sudan's relationship with Ethiopia continues to be complicated by the presence of Eritreans in Sudan who oppose the Ethiopian Government and by the presence of dissident Sudanese in Ethiopia. Armed attacks against the Nimeiri Government were mounted from Ethiopia in 1984.

Sudan is a poor country, but has considerable developmental potential, especially in agriculture. Despite a number of reforms, the country is in a precarious financial situation and suffering from serious drought. It has been obliged to restrain imports, seek debt rescheduling, cut back its development program, and rely on heavy donor food imports. The insecurity in the south has created new problems for the economy, e.g., postponement of oil field development and pipeline construction.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no known instances of politically inspired killings in 1984. However, the level of fighting between the Sudanese people's armed forces and southern insurgents escalated in 1984. Insurgents operate freely in the countryside of about one-half of Bahr El Ghazal region and two-thirds of Upper Nile region, and have mounted attacks on many towns and military garrisons in these areas. Southern insurgent groups have killed several thousand non-combatants (mostly southerners) in the course of their attacks on villages and military garrisons. Twice they have attacked riverboats primarily carrying civilians. In one case as many as several hundred people were killed. In February, insurgents attacked Chevron Oil Company's base camp at Rub Kona in the south's Upper Nile region, killing three foreign workers. Sudanese military units have at times not discriminated between combatants and non-combatants in their operations against insurgent groups. Fights between rival southern insurgent groups, inter-tribal warfare, and banditry in the south have also caused numerous deaths.

SUDAN

b. Disappearance

There were no known cases of politically inspired disappearances in Sudan in 1984. On four occasions, the insurgents took hostage Westerners working in the south. A few still remain hostage.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There have been no reported cases of torture in Sudan in 1984. The criminal code introduced in 1983 contains penalities based on traditional Islamic laws. Public lashing for both men and women is now a common punishment for many minor crimes. For example, those found guilty of drinking/possessing liquor, blasphemy, gambling, or illegal possession of commodities usually receive lashes (often with a fine and/or imprisonment). The maximum lashing sentence is 100 lashes. The new code made right-hand amputation the standard sentence for theft of anything valued at over $40. Aggravated theft and many other offenses carry a maximum penalty of cross-limb amputation, i.e., of the right hand and left foot.

As of December 31, 1984, there had been 54 hand and 16 cross-limb amputations. In the same period there were eight public hangings. The first man hanged under the new penal code, in June 1984, was convicted of armed robbery. All of the others executed were convicted of murder. Three were sentenced to posthumous crucifixion after hanging, but the crucifixion was not carried out. No women have been sentenced to amputation or hanging. The exact proportion of non-Muslims and Muslims subjected to these punishments is not available, because neither prison records nor official announcements record the religion or ethnic background of those sentenced. Amputations and hangings continued after the state of emergency was lifted in October. Under the Islam-based criminal code, persons injured by someone committing a criminal act have the option to invoke the right of retribution. (The victim would otherwise accept monetary compensation from the defendant.) For example, in one case, a woman found to have started a fight in which another woman's arm was broken was sentenced to have her arm broken as punishment. There were three reported instances of such punishment in 1984; the others involved two tooth extractions and a stabbing.

Adultery by Muslims and recurrent homosexuality are capital offenses. No capital sentences have been executed owing to the onerous standard of proof required. (For adultery, the testimony of four male eyewitnesses is required before a sentence of death can be imposed.) More circumstantial evidence of adultery or homosexuality has resulted in conviction for "shameful acts." Evidence of adultery has also sometimes resulted in conviction for "attempted adultery." Many people have been convicted of and lashed for these offenses.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution guarantees habeas corpus and requires a court-issued warrant to arrest a citizen. The State Security Act of 1975 authorizes arrest without a warrant and detention without charges for renewable 90-day periods on security grounds. Many persons have been detained for short periods of time under the Security Act, then either released or tried. About 80 people, mainly from the Ansar sect and the Republican Brothers, were taken into custody in mid-1983. In December, Ansar leader Sadiq al Mahdi and his chief lieutenants were released after 15 months detention, as were Republican Brother leader Mahmoud Taha and several followers.

(In January 1985, Taha and four other Republican Brothers were rearrested for distributing anti-Shari'a literature and condemned to death by a civilian court for the crime of apostasy, unless they recanted. Taha was executed when he refused to acknowledge the authority of the court or to recant. The others were granted amnesty, after they had all recanted and sought the court's clemency. After Taha's execution, Sudanese security authorites rounded up several hundred Republican Brothers. Some were later released. Although the Republican Brother movement has been declared heretical and illegal, it is not known whether additional Republican Brothers will be tried.)

At the end of 1984, there were 230 Baathists and communists in detention and an unknown but probably small number of southerners. Nuba priest Philip Abbas Gaboush and 208 others, mostly Nubas and southerners, were detained in late October in connection with an alleged coup plot. As the year ended, their trial before a special criminal court was in process. (In January 1985, Gaboush and the entire group were released when he petitioned the President for amnesty.)

Nimeiri's 1984 state of emergency decree suspended the arrest warrant requirement, habeas corpus, and the right to bail. People found violating the law were arrested on the spot and immediately jailed with no access to an attorney. Most cases were brought quickly to trial. Lifting of the state of emergency restored these suspended rights. However, bail must now be deposited in full, and in cash, prior to release, whereas before the state of emergency a signed guarantee of bail was sufficient.

During the state of emergency, authorities aggressively enforced laws against adultery, hoarding commodities, and possession/trafficking of alcohol. Some married couples found together were jailed for attempted adultery until they could prove they were married. Some merchants with permission to possess excess amounts of controlled commodities were jailed until they could provide proof. Some non-Muslims, for whom sale of alcohol is illegal but possession is not, were arrested for selling alcohol when found in possession of small amounts.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Current trial procedures have their origins in the state of emergency which was canceled in September 1984. Under the state of emergency, specially-created "emergency courts," later renamed "decisive justice courts," followed summary procedures. These three-man courts consisted of a policeman, military officer, and a civilian regarded as pious but untrained in law. The accused was not allowed to be represented by legal counsel, though an attorney could be present in court as a "friend." Evidence was largely oral testimony by the accused and witnesses. No record was kept. Trials were short, and sentences other than amputation or death were carried out immediately after being decided. There was no appeal. Death sentences had to be approved by the President.

Limited appeal rights reappeared in July with the establishment of a Decisive Justice Court of Appeal. Appeals had to be submitted within three days of sentencing. The Appeals Court generally limited its scope to the question of whether sentence was appropriate. The judge who originally passed sentence also sat on the Court of Appeal, and most sentences were upheld. In two instances, the Appeals Court added hand amputation to a lesser sentence. Once it lowered a death sentence to 40 lashes when the accused changed his confession.

Shortly after President Nimeiri lifted the state of emergency and abolished the decisive justice courts, a new judiciary system was set up along the same lines. Summary procedures continue to be followed in every criminal trial, with no records kept. The accused may now be represented by an attorney, but defense counsel may not cross-examine witnesses. The appeals procedure is unchanged. The Court of Appeal is the final authority for criminal cases and the Supreme Court is not involved. Most of the decisive justice court judges have been appointed to the new judiciary.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Emergency regulations in 1984 empowered the police and armed forces to enter and search private homes and businesses, to stop and inspect all vehicles, and to interrogate any person without prior judicial authorization. Authorities used these powers frequently during the first two months of the state of emergency and with decreasing frequency thereafter. The lifting of the state of emergency formally cancelled these arbitrary police powers. However, under the State Security Act, security forces maintain the power to apprehend and detain persons without a warrant.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Newspapers, magazines, radio, and television in Sudan are under government ownership, and there is little criticism of the Government. Coverage of internal events is largely confined to reports published by the Sudan news agency (Suna) which is an office of the presidency. The monthly English-language magazine Sudanow, however, sometimes contains articles mildly critical of government policies and programs. Foreign publications are generally available in Sudan and are not censored. On occasion, a particular issue of a foreign publication containing an article critical of the Sudanese Government has been withheld from circulation.

Citizens, including senior government officials, openly criticize government policies, including those of the President, in personal expression and display little fear of retaliation. Sudanese often voice strong criticism aimed either at government policies or the advice and conduct of advisors and ministers. Debate in the Assembly is also quite free. However, government tolerance of criticism does have its limits. In August 1984, a man who had interrupted and denounced the President while he was speaking in a mosque, was sentenced to two years in jail and 80 lashes. Suna published the substance of his criticisms, however. (On January 23, 1985, it was announced that he had submitted an appeal for clemency to President Nimeiri and apologized for his actions and was released from imprisonment.)

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution guarantees the freedom to organize labor unions. The State Security Act of 1975 forbids any strike, work stoppage, or collective resignation. Labor is officially represented in the Sudan Socialist Union through two federations which are independent of government control--the Sudanese Workers Trade Union Federation and the Sudanese Federation of Employees Trade Unions. Union membership is estimated at about nine percent of the working population. In both the private and public sectors, unions engage in collective bargaining for wage increases and benefits. Unions, trade associations, and professional groups are permitted to maintain relations with recognized international bodies in their fields. Though freedom to form new trade unions was suspended during the state of emergency, the Sudan Workers Trade Union Federation held its annual congress in May and the Sudan Railway Workers Trade Union completed elections for a new executive committee in late July.

There was a strike by the Sudan's doctors' union from March 1 to April 12 in protest over low government salaries for doctors and poor conditions in hospitals. Though the Government threatened the union's leaders with imprisonment under the State Security Act of 1975, the two sides eventually worked out an acceptable compromise. In May, however, President Nimeiri abolished the doctors' union and all other professional unions on the grounds that they had become too politicized.

c. Freedom of Religion

Islam predominates in the northern two-thirds of Sudan, while traditional African religions and Christianity constitute the major beliefs in the south. Small Christian communities (Coptic, Greek, Syrian) exist in the north, primarily in the Khartoum area. Many non-Muslim southerners have migrated to the cities in the north in search of work. Under the 1973 Constitution, Islam, as the religion of the majority, and Christianity, as the religion of a "large number" of Sudanese, are recognized as "religions of Sudan." The religious rights of adherents to traditional African religions are not restricted. The Constitution also states that Islamic law and custom shall be the main source of legislation.

In 1984 President Nimeiri proposed a set of amendments to the Constitution which, among other things, would have declared Sudan to be an Islamic republic and made the President its religious as well as secular leader. The peoples' assemblies of all three southern regions passed resolutions urging rejection of the proposed amendments because they would deny full rights to non-Muslims. Southern representatives made similar arguments during debate on the amendments in the National People's Assembly, which postponed debate in mid-July and adjourned without ratifying the amendments.

Southerners have also opposed the Islam-based criminal code on the grounds that it infringes upon the rights of non-Muslims. Most southerners, as non-Muslims, believe that Sudan's legal codes, based in part on traditional Islamic laws and containing Islamic punishment for certain crimes, intrinsically make non-Muslims second class citizens. While insisting that the new laws are fair because they treat Muslims and non-Muslims equally, the Government has not implemented them in the three southern regions. However, the laws have been enforced on non-Muslims, including southerners, living in the north.

Groups of military and other public employees which included non-Muslims have been required en masse to swear an Islamic oath of personal fealty to the President.

The Government provides financial support to many of the country's mosques and to Muslim educational projects. Islamic missionaries are actively attempting to convert non-Muslims in the south. Attempting to convert Muslims to another religion is strictly forbidden. Christian missionaries freely operate welfare and education projects in the south. The Christian communities of Sudan maintain strong links with their coreligionists outside Sudan without impediment. Non-Muslim Sudanese are represented in all strata of government, security institutions, and private organizations. There is no discrimination in Sudan against any of the various Muslim sects, except insofar as they are politically active. There are three major Muslim political groupings: the Ansar, the Khatmiyya, and the Muslim Brotherhood. The religious practices of these groups are unrestricted, but political activities considered a threat to the security of the state often result in the imprisonment of key leaders. For example, Ansar leader Sadiq Al Mahdi and several of his followers were under detention until their release in December, as were leaders of the Republican Brothers, a very small group. The Khatmiyya are politically inactive. The Muslim Brothers now participate widely in the Government.

Christian-Muslim relations in the Nuban areas of South Kordofan have always been uneasy and tensions have reached a new level of confrontation over the past few months. Authorities recently ordered 16 Christian churches in the Nuba-inhabited area of Heiban in South Kordofan to be closed. A number of local residents and churchmen were arrested for disobeying the order. An Italian priest in Kadugli was arrested, charged with "inciting the people against the government" and two clinics in Kadugli operated by Italian priests and nuns were closed. When Heiban area residents protested, the Chairman of the Higher Council for Religious Affairs and the Deputy Governor of Kordofan ordered the Commissioner of South Kordofan to allow the oldest of the churches to reopen. He has not complied; and two churches in Heiban remain closed and the churches in the surrounding area remain open, except four which were burned down by persons unknown.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Although freedom of movement is constitutionally guaranteed, a constitutional article suspending internal movement in cases of national security is used by the Government to reduce the number of Sudanese and foreign migrants moving to major urban centers.

The Government has taken steps to reduce the flow of Sudanese professionals and skilled workers leaving the country for Gulf states in search of higher salaries. Certain professionals (such as doctors) who have graduated from local universities must spend a fixed term of service in Sudan before being allowed to work overseas. Other categories of technicians in short supply find it difficult to obtain exit visas. Persons currently employed in Sudan who wish to work for an extended period of time in another country must obtain a leave of absence from their employer. The tax on foreign earned income was recently lowered from 10 percent to 2.5 percent.

Sudan currently hosts over 600,000 persons displaced from Ethiopia, about 165,000 from Uganda, and as many as 100,000 from Chad. Despite the tremendous burden on Sudan's food resources and administrative capabilities, the Government has received them hospitably and works closely with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and other international groups to accommodate their needs. Sudan exerts no pressure to repatriate, but discourages them from moving from their placement centers into heavily populated urban areas. During 1984 a small number of Ugandans voluntarily returned to their country. Approximately 60,000 Sudanese have moved across the border into Ethiopia in the past two years due to unsettling political and economic conditions in southern Sudan. The Government has appealed to them to return and promised there will be no recrimination, as long as they do not take up insurgent activities.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

President Nimeiri and his close associates dominate all branches of government, as well as the Sudan Socialist Union, the only legal political party in Sudan since 1971, which selects the sole candidate for the presidential elections. In 1977 Nimeiri's nomination was challenged in the Sudan Socialist Union but he won easily. In 1983 Nimeiri alone stood for nomination, and he received affirmative votes reported at more than 99 percent.

The Sudan Socialist Union seeks to include all sectors of society. The Union must approve all candidates for both the People's Assembly and the regional assemblies, although candidates need not belong to it. The Union rarely rejects a candidacy. All candidates must run on non-partisan platforms.

A degree of legislative branch independence from the executive was demonstrated in 1984 by the National People's Assembly's failure to ratify President Nimeiri's proposed constitutional amendments. The three southern regional People's Assemblies also adopted resolutions opposing them.

In maintaining his power, Nimeiri has over the years pursued twin policies of national reconciliation and decentralization. In 1972 he negotiated an end to the civil war by granting the south special regional autonomy in such local issues as education, culture, and agriculture. In 1977 Nimeiri dissuaded several northern political factions from active opposition but left outside the regime's reconciliation umbrella the Communist Party, Baathists, Republican Brothers, and others. The Ansar headed by Sadiq Al Mahdi, were included in the reconciliation until 1983 when Sadiq broke with Nimeiri. The Muslim Brotherhood has members in the Government, and operates informally but openly to look after its political interests.

After dividing the north into six regions, Nimeiri extended additional decentralization to the south in June 1983 by abolishing the southern regional government and creating three southern regions. Though some southern politicians supported this move, many more southerners opposed it, considering it a violation of the special regional autonomy guaranteed by the 1972 Addis Ababa Accords. Nimeiri had said he was ready to reunite the three regions at the end of an 18-month trial period, if the southerners so desired, but there has been little response to date to his call for dialogue, and the status quo remains in effect.

Signs of southern dissatisfaction with the central Government increased in 1984, taking the form of attacks by growing insurgent groups on government installations in the south as well as public criticism by southern leaders. Southerners point to redivision of the south, introduction of the Islam-based penal code, and the proposal of a constitutional amendment to declare Sudan an Islamic republic as evidence that they receive less than equal consideration in decisions on matters affecting the entire country. The Government has offered amnesty to insurgents willing to lay down their arms and proposed dialogue with southerners to resolve their grievances.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Sudanese Christian leaders have protested the application of Islamic laws in Sudan, particularly noting that sentences such as severance of limbs and lashing are punishments that "degrade the person" and "dull the morals of the nation." Amnesty International also protested the use of such punishments in several messages to the Sudanese Government in 1984. As a response, the Government has stated that the new laws are based on strict adherence to Islam, which the Government alleges provides greater protection of human rights than Sudan's old secular laws or the laws of many other countries. Amnesty International in its 1984 report (covering 1983) expressed its concern over large scale detentions without trial of political opponents of the Government. Freedom House's 1984-85 rating for Sudan is "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

With a per capita GNP of $443 for 1982, Sudan is a poor country. Its developmental potential, particularly in agriculture, is considerable. However, over-ambitious government development plans throughout much of the 1970's, combined with poor financial management, created staggering international debt obligations. Because of its precarious financial position, Sudan has been obliged to restrain imports, seek debt relief through rescheduling, and curtail its development program. In concert with the International Monetary Fund, Sudan has undertaken a number of economic reforms in recent years. Nevertheless, the country's financial situation will remain problematic for years to come.

Sudan's population is 21.1 million, growing at an annual rate of 2.7 percent. The country's area is just under one million square miles. Life expectancy is almost 48 years, and infant mortality occurs at a rate of 118.9 per thousand live births. In 1981, the primary school enrollment ratio was about 48 percent--56 percent of boys and 39 percent of girls. Overall attendance figures obscure, however, dramatically lower rates in rural Sudan, particularly the south. The World Bank estimates that 46 percent of Sudan's population has access to safe water. In 1977, caloric supply as a percent of the daily requirement was 96.8. However, the current drought in much of Sudan has raised the specter of malnutrition in some regions of the country, particularly the west. In addition, the drought has resulted in migration from the northern to the southern parts of Kordofan and Darfur. Migrants from the west have appeared in large numbers near Khartoum. An internationally organized food relief effort was launched in 1984.

In addition to economic constraints, geography and cultural diversity have had an adverse effect upon delivery of government services and income distribution. Vast distances, deserts, swamps, and rain forests impede transportation and communication. Sudan's population includes urban groups, tenant farmers at large irrigated schemes, isolated riverline settlers, nomadic and semi-nomadic herdsmen, and a plethora of tribal groups. If one excluded the population settled along the Nile and the inhabitants of perhaps half a dozen urban centers, the indices for health, sanitation, and education cited above would drop dramatically.

The great cultural dichotomy in Sudan is between the north and the south. Neither is monolithic. In addition to ethnic Arabs, the north includes indigenous tribesmen and descendants of Central and West African settlers. The south is a rich mixture of tribal groups and languages. Generally speaking, however, the north is Muslim and arabized. The south is non-Arabized African and non-Muslim, with animists outnumbering Christians.

Southerners have traditionally felt aggrieved at their treatment at the hands of northerners, and this includes economic matters. The Government is formally committed to the concept of a culturally diverse Sudan. Southerners do fill high positions in the Government, including the second Vice Presidency. But the south remains the most economically backward region in Sudan. However, the poorly developed infrastructure of the south, its lack of access to international markets, and the present emphasis upon the rehabilitation of existing projects as well as Sudan's general poverty, all tend to limit developmental progress in the south. Moreover, much donor aid activity has ceased in the south due to security concerns.

SUDAN

While the distinction between men's and women's roles in Sudanese society persists, it is not so strong as in many other Arab and African countries. Women are accepted in professions, even though their absolute numbers are small. In rural areas, division of labor exists, but men and women can be seen working alongside one another in some endeavors. The drive to Islamize Sudanese society has not had a dramatic impact upon women's rights thus far. While more conservati attire has been encouraged, the veil has not become mandatory. As a result of the rash of arrests for "attempted adultery" during the early months of the state of emergency, relations between unmarried persons have become more circumspect. Women retain the right to drive automobiles and work openly in offices with men. Female circumcision, though illegal, is widely practiced throughout much of Sudan. Efforts to eradicate it have been unsuccessful.

SWAZILAND

Although Swaziland is nominally a traditional monarchy, currently ruled by a Queen Regent, political power is now exercised by a group of senior politicans and traditional leaders associated with the Swazi Royal Family. The most important concentrations of power are found in the Liqoqo, a traditional body of advisors appointed by the Crown, and in the Ministers of the Cabinet. In practice, Swaziland's Government features both "modern" and "traditional" branches--a Cabinet, Parliament, and courts which follow Western law, and a tribal system with "national" courts, which follow Swazi law and custom.

The Kingdom attained independence in 1968 with a Constitution that provided for a popularly elected Parliament and for the fundamental rights of the individual. On the grounds the Constitution had introduced political practices incompatible with the traditional Swazi way of reaching decisions by consensus, King Sobhuza II decreed its repeal in 1973. He assumed supreme power and governmental decisions thereafter were made by King-in-Council. Parliament reopened in January 1979 with some members chosen through an indirect selection process, but the King continued to be vested with the country's executive authority.

King Sobhuza died in 1982 and Queen Regent Dzeliwe assumed the duties of head of state. In 1983 there was a dispute over the role and authority between the modern and traditional elements of the Government, which resulted in the replacement of the Prime Minister and the eventual replacement of Queen Regent Dzeliwe by Queen Regent Ntombi. During the same period, Ntombi's son, Prince Makhosetive, was officially declared the heir to the Swazi throne and is expected to become King in the next few years upon completion of certain traditional ceremonies.

Although the authority of the Swazi crown covers a wide spectrum of Swazi life, it is limited in practice by a complex system of traditional rights and responsibilities, which requires that it be exercised in accordance with unwritten Swazi custom. Swazi custom does not allow public dissent against the Government, and those who publicly criticized the Government or demonstrated against the authorities have, on occasion, been suppressed. The Royal Swazi Police are widely regarded as being honest, professional, and efficient, but this image has been somewhat tarnished by reports of police violence against suspected criminals. The judiciary is independent.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no cases or allegations of political killings by either officials of the Government or opposition political groups.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of disappearances occurring in the country in 1984.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture is, as a rule, not practiced in Swaziland. However, following the conclusion of the Nkomati Accords between South Africa and Mozambique in 1984, a large number of African National Congress (ANC) activists, many armed with automatic weapons and high explosives, fled from Mozambique into Swaziland. Swazi efforts to round up these militants resulted in several gun battles during which a Swazi police officer, a soldier, and two ANC personnel were killed and several others were wounded. More than 80 ANC members were eventually apprehended and, with the assistance of UNHCR, relocated in another country. During this period of tension, police authorities beat several militants and persons suspected of being involved with ANC activities.

There were some reports of police threats and beatings in the handling of common criminals. Corporal punishment is permitted under Swazi law, and caning is occasionally administered to youths involved in petty or violent crimes. Police jails are often overcrowded and unsanitary with low standards of food, which probably reflects the country's economic limitations rather than any intent to inflict punishment. The country's main prison includes facilities for teaching manual trades. The health care and diet in the prisons approximate those available to the general population. Prisoners are allowed visits from family members.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

A 1978 law permits the Government to detain any individual for renewable periods of 60 days without being charged. Although the law provides that such detention shall be made public, no instance of detention under that law has been officially acknowledged until after the detained individuals have been released (although detention usually becomes public knowledge in a short time). Detention is not subject to appeal to the courts, although it may be appealed directly to the Monarch. Immediate family members are usually allowed to visit detainees. The year 1983 ended with 18 Swazis being held in detention. In March 1984, 10 of these were freed with the remainder being released in April. No one was placed under detention during 1984. However, it is sometimes difficult to determine whether a person has been placed in detention or is simply being held under police investigation. Swazi law allows the police to hold an individual for "a reasonable time" without charges; in some cases the period has stretched into weeks. Attorneys have experienced difficulties in gaining access to their clients on the justification that police investigations have not been completed. Habeas corpus may be invoked, but this is an expensive course of action for a suspect with limited means who is being investigated for a minor charge. During the month of November the former Finance Minister, the former Chief of Staff of the Army and the former Army Chief of Logistics were taken into police custody, where they remain. Public statements by the Government have indicated they are being held "for investigation" and not under the detention authority. According to one press report, the former Finance Minister claimed his attorney had withdrawn from his case because of intimidation. In contrast to these cases, an ANC refugee, officially resident in Swaziland, was also taken into custody for several days, but was released by court order after a writ of habeus corpus was filed.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The right to a fair public trial is provided for by law and is generally honored in practice. The judiciary consists of a Court of Appeals, a High Court, and various subordinate magistrates' courts. The Head of State appoints members of the Court of Appeals and the High Court. Parallel to this modern government structure is a traditional structure consisting of the Liqoqo (Supreme Council of State, which advises the Queen Regent), traditional courts, and 40 regional councils.

In magistrates' courts, a defendant is entitled to counsel at his own expense. Court-appointed defense counsel is provided in capital cases. Defendants are made fully aware of the charges against them. They and their lawyers are generally able to inform themselves of the evidence on which the charges are based. The courts are independent of executive and military control. Appeals from the magistrates' courts may be heard by the High Court, and all final appeals are heard by the Court of Appeals which is the highest judiciary body. These rights are not guaranteed to persons held under the 1978 detention law or charged with sedition.

In traditional courts, where ethnic Swazis may be brought for relatively minor offenses and violations of Swazi traditional laws or customs, legal counsel is not allowed, but defendants are usually heard on their own behalf. Swazi traditional law has not been formally codified, but both offenses and punishments are limited and findings are subject to a review system and appeal to the High Court and Court of Appeals.

In 1983, the Swazi Parliament passed an amendment to the Sedition and Subversive Activities bill which increased the maximum penalty for sedition from 2 years to 20 and permitted the appointment of a special tribunal to hear such cases. It was left to the Prime Minister to appoint the members of the tribunal and determine their qualifications. Proceedings of such a tribunal are held in camera if the prosecution so requests. There is no provision for appealing the tribunal's decision to the courts. It is not clear if the amendment is, in fact, in force and there are no known cases of persons being tried under these new provisions.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Swazi custom places a high value on home and family. In general, Swazi land law requires a warrant issued by a magistrate for search of a home or other premises. However, senior police officers are permitted to search for evidence without a warrant if the suspected crime is of a serious nature, and this procedure is frequently followed. There is no evidence that the Government censors correspondence or commits other violations of the home.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech is limited. The Prime Minister and other officials have repeatedly directed that Swazis critical of the Government express their views only to their chiefs for discussion in traditional Swazi councils. Anti-government demonstrations or leaflets are regarded as seditious and are treated accordingly. The Swazi radio and television stations are government-controlled. A private company publishes a daily newspaper with English and Siswati editions, and there is also a semi-governmental English-language paper which can be quite independent in its views. The media, government-controlled and private, practice self-censorship, most particularly in refraining from critical comment on government activities or on problems dealing with the Royal Family. However, the Government does not precensor newspapers nor have there been reports of a particular edition being seized by the authorities. In 1984, on several occasions, journalists were summoned before officials in connection with controversial stories and threats have been made on the possible closing of a paper. In one instance, a journalist and the paper's editor were interrogated by the police and kept in custody overnight. The Government proscribes publications it deems to be prejudicial to the interests of defense, public safety and order, public morality, and public health. In practice, except for material that is obscene or communist-oriented, the local and international press (which sometimes features reports critical of Swazi political leaders) circulate freely.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The King's proclamation of April 12, 1973, prohibits meetings of a political nature and processions or demonstrations in any public place without the consent, sometimes withheld, of the Commissioner of Police. In September, there were disturbances on the University of Swaziland campus following an attempt to impose a government-appointed student organization. This was followed in October by demonstrations on the campus and in Manzini after the Government expelled a former student leader to South Africa. The demonstration in Manzini was suppressed by riot police, resulting in several students seriously injured and hospitalized. Following these incidents, the University was closed for a short period and the Government appointed a commission to look into the problems at the University. By the end of the year, the Government had still not announced what decisions, if any, it had made as a result of the inquiry.

Except for the prohibition on certain anti-government activity, freedom of association is generally permitted. Employees may, and do, strike and picket. Differences between labor and management can also be taken to the Industrial Court which came into operation in 1983. Under the Industrial Relations Act, unions are required to register with the Government and, to date, six unions representing workers in the fields of agriculture, commerce, electrical power, manufacturing, finance, and transportation have been registered. The Swaziland Federation of Trade Unions participantes in the International Labor Organization and is a member of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity.

c. Freedom of Religion

Swaziland is traditionally hospitable to all religious beliefs and a great variety of missionaries are active throughout the country. However, since the death of King Sobhuza in August 1982, some difficulties have developed between Jehovah's Witnesses and traditional government officials, and there have been continued reports on disagreements between school authorities and Jehovah's Witness students over singing of the National Anthem and similar matters.

SWAZILAND

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Swazis may travel freely within Swaziland and can generally obtain a travel document to travel in southern Africa. Obtaining a passport is more difficult and time-consuming. Occasionally the Government refuses to issue a passport if the applicant's travel is considered prejudicial to Swaziland or if the applicant does not appear to have adequate means of support while abroad. Although Swaziland is a signatory to the U.N. Protocol Relating to the Status of Refugees, refugees who leave Swaziland on U.N. travel documents are generally not granted the right to return. Some residents of Swaziland, of mixed ethnic background, have experienced difficulty in obtaining official determination of their citizenship status and therefore have difficulties in obtaining passports.

Swaziland accepts refugees from neighboring countries and treats them adequately. By far the largest number of refugees is from South Africa, primarily ethnic Swazis who fled Zulu administration in the black homeland of Kwazulu. In 1984, Swaziland accepted over 800 refugees fleeing from military clashes in Mozambique. During the same year, the African National Congress accused the Swazi authorities of complicity in handing over to South African security police four members being held in a Swaziland jail. The Swaziland Government denied this charge. In October 1984, a former student at the University of Swaziland, who was born in South Africa, was expelled into South Africa after being declared a prohibited immigrant. He was deported even though he claimed to be a Swazi citizen and had an appeal pending against the deportation action.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Political parties are outlawed and organized opposition to the Government in the usual sense does not exist. Following the completion of its term, the Swazi Parliament was dissolved during the latter part of 1983. A local committee in each of 40 regional councils nominated 4 candidates for the position of electors and the people of each area selected 2. The 80 electors, so chosen, then voted for 40 new members for the lower House of Parliament, the House of Assembly, and 10 additional members were appointed by the Queen Regent. The full Assembly of 50 members then selected 10 Senators and the Queen Regent appointed an additional 10 to make a total of 20 Senators in the Senate. The Head of State must approve all laws passed by Parliament. The Parliament has served occasionally as a forum for examination and criticism of government policies, but matters are seldom pressed to a vote and, when they are, unanimity is usually the result.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government of Swaziland does not normally respond substantively to inquiries of representatives of human rights groups concerning the welfare and whereabouts of individual political detainees. There are no organizations based within the country that observe, report, or contest human rights violations. In its 1984 Report, Amnesty International noted its concern about detention without trial of opponents of the Government and about the lack of procedural safeguards with the new sedition law. Freedom House terms Swaziland "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Swaziland is an open market economy, with limited government intervention, centered on trade, agriculture, and forestry. The modern sector is dominated by large export-oriented firms, which are frequently foreign-owned, and by the traditional sector, which comprises about 80 percent of the population. Since independence in 1968, Swaziland's per capita gross national product (GNP) has risen from about $300 to an estimated $940 in 1982. Despite this growth, subsistence farmers, who comprise two-thirds of the population, have not kept pace. Total income per resident of rural homesteads for crop year 1983/84 was approximately $375. In 1980 the World Bank estimated that nearly half the rural and urban population were below the poverty line. A recent estimate found that 39 percent of urban families were below the 1983 proverty line. The drought in 1982 and 1983 prevented real economic growth, but the 1984 output of the food crop staple, corn, was the highest in history. From 1971 to 1982, the real annual per capita growth of gross domestic product averaged 1.3 percent per year.

Swaziland's population in mid-1984 was estimated to be 651,000 and growing by 3 percent per year. (The Government estimates are 626,000 and 3.4 percent.) The rapid growth rate limits the amount of land available for cultivation by each homestead. It is difficult for a woman to be allocated land on her own.

Economically, the country suffers from three interrelated and emerging problems: the inability of traditional agriculture to generate consistent food surpluses and provide financially acceptable alternatives to paid employment; the decreasing ability of the economy to generate jobs; and stagnant government revenue and growing inefficiencies resulting in increasing government debt.

The Employment Act of 1980 forbids employers to discriminate among employees based on race, religion, sex, marital status or political affiliation. It requires equal pay for equal work. There are provisions covering the employment of children, maternity leave, and domestic employees. Legally, women are not discriminated against in the job market but, in practice, discrimination occurs frequently. Around three-fourths of the wage paying jobs are held by men; their average wage rate by skill category is higher than for females. An element in the income tax law, which taxed married women more than married men, was partially removed in 1982.

The ability of Swazi women to deal with the problems of a developing society is hampered by both legal and cultural constraints. Traditional values are a major influence on the role of women in Swazi society. Since men are away from their homesteads much of the time, women perform most agricultural tasks and have virtually all responsibility for child rearing and domestic chores. However, they are not given authority to make necessary decisions, to make expenditures to acquire additional capital, or to try new approaches. Women are, in some cases, not legally equal to men, and a married woman is virtually a minor. She is not responsible for contracts she signs, and she cannot own real property or inherit property under normal circumstances. She must obtain her husband's permission to borrow money, to leave the country, and often to take a job. A divorced woman has no right to the custody of her children, although she may have to care for them with no support from their father. A small and growing number of women are beginning to participate in social, economic and political life outside their traditional fields of teaching, nursing, and clerical work. Women have equal access to schools and constitute around half the student body in nearly all institutions.

The overwhelming constraint to truly indigenous development in virtually every area is the shortage of knowledgeable technical and administrative leaders, professionals, and institutions capable of introducing progressive attitudes, systems, and technologies into the society. Primary school enrollment is over 100 percent but, with a large number of overage children in school, only around 80 percent of the primary school-age children are actually in primary school. Standards are low and declining because emphasis has been on meeting the demand for additional school places, not on quality. Intensive efforts have been made to increase the adult literacy rate. The World Bank estimates it at 44.8 percent in 1976; 1982 estimates show a 65 percent adult literacy rate.

Since independence, the Government has invested heavily in improving and expanding health care services. Clinics have been built and put into operation at a rapid rate, placing most Swazis within eight kilometers of some type of health facility. The number of people per physician or nurse is reasonably good, and the society is able to provide an estimated 99 percent of the essential calories per person. Although the crude death rate has fallen from 19 per 1,000 in 1976 to 17.1 per 1,000 in 1984, there are still severe health problems which decrease the quality of life. There is a lack of clean, disease-free water; estimates in 1975 showed only a third of the country had access to safe water. The 1984 infant mortality rate is estimated to be 133 per 1,000 live births, and life expectancy is 56 years. (The Government estimates it to be 48 years).

TANZANIA

Tanzania is ruled by Julius K. Nyerere, who has been President and Chairman of the country's single political party almost continuously since independence in 1961. He has run unopposed in four elections. Opposition parties and candidates are prohibited. Within this one-party system, voters have some choice of contending political candidates for Parliament and local government, and parliamentary members have frequently been voted out of office. Tanzania's military, the Tanzania People's Defense Force, has played a regional role outside Tanzania: it was instrumental in overthrowing the Amin regime in Uganda and has an advisory role in Mozambique. Until recently it maintained a small contingent on the Seychelles.

Tanzania is a single-party "socialist" state, although its legal and parliamentary systems were originally patterned on the British model. Zanzibar is ruled by the same party as is the mainland, but exercises a considerable degree of autonomy; its legal and parliamentary systems differ substantially from those of the mainland. The Chama Cha Mapinduzi, the sole legal political party in Tanzania, controls activity at all levels of society. Through its system of 10-family cells, it monitors even the most remote areas of the country.

In 1984, the economy continued to deteriorate despite government efforts to check the decline. Although Tanzania ranks very high among per capita aid recipients, it remains one of the world's poorest countries. However, the Government has had success in educating its citizens and in bringing social services to the rural population.

Tanzania's party and national Constitutions provide for equal rights to all citizens regardless of sex, race, ethnic group, or status. Zanzibar's new 1984 constitution guarantees freedom of movement, speech, religion, and association. In practice, however, such legal rights have not always been observed, particularly freedom of speech. Both on the mainland and in Zanzibar religion, custom, and rigid tradition, especially in rural areas, often militate against the exercise of these rights, particularly with regard to the treatment and equality of women. Government policy does not permit the use of torture; however, it occasionally occurs. Police officials have been successfully prosecuted and sentenced to stiff terms of imprisonment for torture, abuse, and death of prisoners. Convicts are required to work without pay either in construction or on prison farms.

During 1984, the Tanzanian Government took steps to address several of the problems which had marred its human rights record during 1983. In September 1984, the Government started a preliminary inquiry into the events surrounding the alleged plot by some 30 individuals to overthrow the Government in early 1983. While the defendants remained in custody under the 1962 Preventive Detention Act, under which detainees can be held indefinitely and have greatly restricted visitation and representation rights, the preliminary inquiry was the first step towards bringing the defendants back into the normal legal process. In late December the High Court announced that 19 of the detained would be charged with treason. The fate of the 11 uncharged individuals remains uncertain. On September 24, the Government allowed the extraordinary legislation which was used to launch the campaign against economic saboteurs to lapse. New legislation now affords persons accused of economic sabotage the full protection of Tanzania's legal systems. However, those persons charged under the previous legislation will still be tried by special tribunals, which do not provide full procedural safeguards. Finally, the Human Resources Deployment Act of May 1983, which requires local governments to ensure that all residents are engaged in lawful, productive activity, was unofficially suspended in late 1983 while the Government formulated plans to institute the Act without massive roundups and deportations to the countryside. In an effort to revive the Act and to implement it in a systematic way, Dar es Salaam city officials conducted a census on December 2 and 3, 1984. Nonetheless, there are few signs that active implementation of the Act will begin soon.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There have been no reports in 1984 of politically motivated killings.

b. Disappearance

There is no evidence of any cases of disappearance of individuals because of either governmental or non-governmental actions.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Tanzanian Government opposes the use of torture as a matter of policy. Nonetheless, there have been indications during the past year that torture has at times been inflicted by police and prison authorities. There is widespread belief in Dar es Salaam that many of the 30 individuals arrested in early 1983 for their participation in an attempted coup d'etat were tortured. There were also reports that some individuals detained during the government campaign against "economic saboteurs" were beaten. Beating of detained individuals by the police almost invariably takes place at the time of apprehension or when the arrested person is first taken to the police station. In 1984, two policemen were held for killing people in two separate incidents involving unlawful use of force.

Tanzania's prisons are generally unhealthful, unsanitary, and overcrowded. The overcrowding was severely exacerbated by the large influx of detainees as a result of the Government's arrest of more than 4,000 people in 1983 and 1984 during the "economic saboteur" roundups. Prison conditions are largely a result of Tanzania's economic difficulties and not a deliberate government effort to subject prisoners to inhuman conditions.

TANZANIA

Traditional defense groups in Central Tanzania called Sungu Sungu or Wasalama, encouraged by both government and party officials in 1983 and 1984 to help eliminate theft in some areas, often used extreme tactics and occasionally took on the appearance of vigilante groups. In late May, armed clashes between over 3,000 Sungu Sungu and villagers led to the death of 47 Sungu Sungu and the arrest of about 100 villagers. In June, 16 members of the Sungu Sungu went on trial for the murder of 2 villagers who were suspected of cattle rustling.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Under the 1962 Preventive Detention Act, police and security officers can, with a written order from the President, arrest and detain indefinitely any person considered dangerous to public order or national security. Such detainees have no recourse to the judicial system once the authorities present a valid detention order to a magistrate. There have been cases, however, where the detainees have been freed when the authorities could not produce the order. Under this Act, a committee was established to oversee the treatment of detainees; the committee reportedly meets only sporadically. The Act further requires that the detainee be informed of the reasons for detention within 15 days. This is rarely done. Persons held under this Act do not have the right to be visited by lawyers or family as is permitted other prisoners.

While exact figures are unavailable, some 1,000 individuals were detained in 1984 under presidential decree for alleged violations of the Economic Sabotage Act. Since adoption of the new legislation on September 24, 1984, which placed persons newly accused of economic crimes within the normal judicial processes and cleared the backlog of "economic sabotage" cases, the number of persons held under the Preventive Detention Act has dropped considerably to approximately 500.

In January 1984, several people in Zanzibar were arrested in connection with the resignation of Aboud Jumbe as President. Wolfgang Dourado, who had been the Zanzibar Attorney General, was linked to persons seeking a dissolution of the Union of Zanzibar and the mainland and was detained under the Preventive Detention Act for 15 weeks. Several prominent persons who had been held under the Act for several years were released without explanation in 1984. This group included Abdul Haji, former leader of the Aga Khan Society and a prominent member of the Ismali community. In recent months, the Government seems to have moved away from the policy of holding people under the Preventive Detention Act instead of pressing criminal charges. Tanzania does not exile citizens.

Tanzanian law requires that a person arrested for crimes other than the security violations discussed above appear within 24 hours before a magistrate to be charged. The prosecution may ask that the accused be detained for 14 days without bail and may request extensions of the period. In practice, when authorities have not followed proper criminal procedures, defendants have successfully overturned convictions on appeal. Despite the legal safeguards, the Deputy Minister of Home Affairs revealed in March that an estimated 4,000 persons had been held for periods of up to 6 years because of incomplete police investigations. In May, a woman who had been held for eight years without trial was released for lack of evidence.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The mainland legal system is based on the British model with modifications to accommodate customary and Islamic law in civil cases. Criminal trials are open to the public and the more sensational are covered by the press. While an independent judiciary is constitutionally mandated, some members of the legal community, including judicial officers, have complained that the legal system is being corrupted through bribery. Although the allegations remain largely undocumented, there is at least one confirmed report of a magistrate demanding a bribe to issue a court order. There has been no suggestion that the Court of Appeals and the High Court are corrupt. Judges are appointed by the executive with the advice of the Chief Justice.

The court system on Zanzibar, which has considerable autonomy, was revised by the Zanzibar Constitution promulgated in late 1984. Under the system used throughout 1984, defendants could not be represented by attorneys, but could request a relative or neighbor to represent them as long as no fee was paid. With the exception of High Court judges, no members of the Zanzibar judiciary were required to have any training in the law. The Supreme Council, which could review decisions made by the High Court, was attached to the Revolutionary Council and accountable to its President. There existed, therefore, considerable possibility of political interference in the judiciary in Zanzibar.

Under the new Zanzibar Constitution, which should be implemented in 1985, People's Courts, which did not provide defendants with normal legal procedures, were abolished. The court system will be integrated into the legal system of the United Republic of Tanzania for the first time. High Court judges will now be required to have both a degree in law and several years' practice prior to appointment to the bench. Defendants will be allowed the right to legal representation. The new Constitution retains Islamic, or Kadhi, courts to deal with marriage, divorce, inheritance, and childcare cases involving only Muslims. Cases concerning constitutional issues and Islamic law will be appealable only within the Zanzibar courts; for the first time, all other cases may be appealed to the Court of Appeal of the United Republic of Tanzania.

The passage of the new law on economic sabotage in 1984, which replaced the Economic Sabotage Act of 1983, appears to have ended a period in which many perceived that the Government sought to circumvent its inability to obtain convictions within the regular court system. However, the special tribunals, established under the Economic Sabotage Act of 1983, which will remain active until cases entered before September 24, 1984, are completed, bypass normal legal procedures by suspending rules of evidence, the right of representation, and the appeal process.

TANZANIA

Although the situation appears to have improved, there have been reports of government harassment of attorneys in controversial cases, such as the coup trial which was reactivated in late 1984; and individual government employees, on occasion, are accused of using their offices to attempt to influence decisions. The High Court has asked magistrates to report any such attempts. Military courts do not try civilians, and there are no security courts. Defendants in civil and military courts (but not in the recently abolished special tribunals) may appeal decisions to the High Court.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Through the party structure, the Government intervenes in the private lives of people. The Chama Cha Mapinduzi has party cadres covering the smallest units of society. The "ten-cell" leader is the party official responsible for monitoring events and resolving problems at the grass-roots level. "Ten-cell" leaders receive an introductory session of evening classes on political indoctrination. Individual cells vary in size from single-family homes to large apartment buildings. Hence, individual ten-cells may have anywhere from 20 to several hundred individuals. Ten-cell leaders, who are unpaid, act as intermediaries between individuals and the Government and are required to resolve problems which the people in their area may have. They also monitor store rationing to ensure "equitable" distribution and report to government or party authorities any suspicious behavior or events within their neighborhood.

The party permits exceptions to be made for police to search without a warrant for unemployed persons and under other special circumstances. There also have been numerous instances of forced entry, search, and harassment of persons suspected of economic crimes. There is evidence that mail is sometimes opened and read by authorities, although the opening of mail is exceptional. Those who are not considered productively employed are not allowed to remain in urban areas. Some have returned voluntarily to their home regions; others have been returned under escort or sent to other rural areas selected by the Government and forced to work.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

These freedoms are limited in practice. The mainland Government owns the only English-language daily newspaper, the National Press Agency, and the mainland radio facility. The Zanzibar Government operates a radio and television station. The Swahili-language paper, which has a daily circulation of 100,000, is owned by the party. There is one monthly Catholic paper with a circulation of 120,000, which covers largely religious news. "Urusi Leo," a Soviet publication, has a weekly circulation of 25,000. The official media, as organs of the state, usually present a unified point of view on important policy matters and do not criticize the premises of overall government domestic or foreign policies. The Government has encouraged criticism by the media of corruption, mismanagement, and "economic sabotage," and permitted publication of frank letters to the editor which are often highly critical of abuses of the system. Radio discussions and symposia have proposed wide-ranging changes in Tanzania's form of government. This criticism is allowed in the context of officially sanctioned debate on the new constitutions. Tanzanian citizens show few inhibitions about expressing criticisms of the system in private conversations. Visiting foreign reporters have considerable freedom, including access to government and party leaders. Academic freedom of inquiry is officially guaranteed; however, in practice, most academicians, relying on the government-run educational system for their livelihood, appear to limit their exploration of sensitive subjects. The importation of foreign books and periodicals is severely limited by the acute shortage of foreign exchange.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The fact that Tanzania is a one-party state limits the freedom of public assembly and association. Legal political gatherings may be organized only by the party or its subgroups. The Government has cracked down on student demonstrations in recent years and ensured that student organizations are party controlled. Students are inhibited from public criticism by concern that their future employment prospects may be jeopardized.

There is one labor union which is run by the party; no other unions may operate. Strikes are prohibited by law. All businesses and government offices with more than a few employees are required to have a union chapter. At the local level, the union is charged with promoting employee welfare. It has little influence on labor policy. Few professional associations exist and those that do are carefully non-political.

The International Labor Organization remains concerned about convict labor in prisons and several ordinances requiring work by adults in communal agriculture and development projects. In March 1984, six peasants in Litapuasi village in southwestern Tanzania were convicted of refusing to do work on a communal farm. The ILO is especially concerned about the Human Resources Deployment Act (see d. below).

c. Freedom of Religion

Tanzania is an essentially secular society which permits freedom of religion. The population of the mainland is roughly one-third Christian, one-third Muslim, and one-third animist. There appear to be no political or social advantages or disadvantages attached to membership in any given faith on the mainland. While there has been a degree of controversy in overwhelmingly Muslim Zanzibar regarding state support of certain mosques, Zanzibaris are generally free to practice any faith they choose without interference.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Apart from the Zanzibar requirement for travel documentation between Zanzibar and the mainland, the Government generally does not restrict travel within the country. Tanzania continues to require its citizens to follow national employment directives stipulating the nature of employment and where they reside. For years, city dwellers have been the subject of police checks for proof of employment. Those without proper documentation have, in some cases, been forced to return to the countryside in an effort to control increasing pressure on urban resources and to reverse declining levels of agricultural production. The Human Resources Deployment Act of 1983 requires local governments to ensure that every resident within their area of jurisdiction engages in productive or other lawful employment. Those persons who do not are subject to transfer to another area and will be required to engage in lawful and gainful employment (as defined by the Government). While this Act has not yet been fully implemented, authorities expect that the most affected group will be the young school-leavers who have migrated from the countryside to the urban areas in search of work. The Government still prosecutes peasants who return to their old villages without permission.

In late 1983, the Dar es Salaam regional authorities launched a series of sweeps designed to net the unemployed. Thousands were arrested and hundreds were sent out from Dar es Salaam to work on national coffee, tea, cashew nut, sugar cane, or sisal plantations. In January, 1,623 people were rounded up in Dar es Salaam, 225 of whom were detained for further questioning as unemployed. While large-scale roundups ceased in January, on May 26, 157 people were arrested in Dar es Salaam for loitering and being unemployed.

Implementation of the Human Resources Deployment Act has been delayed while municipal authorities search for ways of enforcing it without the abuses that marked the October 1983 sweeps. In an effort to revive the Act, the Dar es Salaam City Council conducted a house-by-house survey of all urban residents on December 2-3, 1984. Plans call for other city governments to conduct similar surveys. After the surveys, those who are unemployed or unproductively employed could be repatriated to their home villages or sent to yet-to-be-established centers where they will be engaged, presumably, in agriculture or in small craft workshops.

During the height of the campaign against "economic saboteurs" in 1983, roadblocks were ubiquitous. During 1984 the number of roadblocks declined significantly in the country as a whole, but in areas where surplus crops were produced, roadblocks reappeared to prevent the private movement of food within the country. On November 1 the Government instructed regional governments to end all roadblocks aimed at stopping the free flow of food in Tanzania. The only other roadblocks are in border areas and in areas where disease or poaching are a problem.

There are no restrictions on repatriation. The Extra-territorial Jurisdiction Act empowers the courts to try Tanzanians who commit offenses outside the country. Passports are required for foreign travel and can be difficult to obtain. Those who are successful in obtaining a passport must still obtain tax clearances and approval from the Central Bank to buy tickets. In practice, those planning to emigrate are subject to intense scrutiny by police and tax authorities. Those who do leave the country without authorization are subject to prosecution. Although it is legally possible for citizenship to be revoked, there have been no reports recently that this has been done.

In 1983, President Nyerere was awarded the Nansen Prize of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees for his outstanding assistance to refugees. There is a refugee population of about 100,000 of whom approximately 80 percent are from Burundi, the rest mainly from Uganda and Zaire. Some 30,000 Rwandans were offered naturalization in 1980, although only a few have so far acquired Tanzanian citizenship. The same offer of citizenship is expected to be made to the Burundians when they become self-sufficient. In general, the same services and rights available to citizens are offered to refugees insofar as local resources permit. Tanzania's refugee acceptance is largely limited to persons from contiguous countries. Refugees from other countries are required to find resettlement elsewhere. South Africans who entered Tanzania as members of "liberation" groups are in a different category and are allowed to remain in the country. However, those who resign or are expelled from their "liberation" organizations are refused work and residence permits and several have been imprisoned. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees remains actively engaged in resettling over 100 former members of such groups.

In October 1983, Tanzania and Kenya exchanged some two dozen of their respective nationals who had settled in their two countries as political refugees. Because many of the individuals had been recognized as refugees by both governments and the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), the exchange was viewed by some foreign governments and by the UNHCR as a violation of refugee rights and agreements, and led to representations by U.N. officials to the Tanzanian and Kenyan Governments.

In late 1983 and early 1984, over 10,000 Banyarwanda with large numbers of cattle were reported to have entered Tanzania from Uganda. The Tanzanian Government believed that these people were Rwandan refugees who had already been granted refuge in Uganda and was therefore reluctant to accept them for permanent refuge in Tanzania. Following several rounds of discussions with Ugandan authorities, and after careful screening of the Banyarwanda, the Tanzanian Government discovered that the situation had been exaggerated and that it was only dealing with some 3,000 people, of whom only about 150 had arrived in 1984. The 3,000 people were placed in a camp and as of the end of 1984 were awaiting resettlement elsewhere in Tanzania.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Political activity is forbidden except within the party. President Nyerere directs the party structure and bureaucracy, which are the dominant forces in the country. There are no overt opposition groups, although the coup plot discovered in January 1983, and the publicity associated with the trial of the plotters in late 1984, suggested at least some internal opposition to the regime. Some Tanzanian nationals living abroad who consider themselves political exiles advocate a change of government. Under the Constitution which was in effect throughout 1984, one-half of the national parliament was chosen in elections, with only limited choice of contending candidates approved by the party. The other half was composed of members appointed by the Government and the various "mass organizations" associated with the party. The new Union Constitution adopted in late 1984 will increase the proportion of representatives chosen in elections. Any citizen is free to enter the first stage election process. The National Executive Committee of the party chooses at least two candidates from a list provided by each constituency to compete in the general election. Voters have registered dissatisfaction by sending incumbent members of Parliament to defeat. Following recent changes in the party constitution, candidates will be rank-ordered on the ballot according to their party record. Party membership and, hence, active participation in the political process are not open to anyone engaged in private business. This includes landlords and directors and shareholders of private companies. The restriction is not uniformly applied, but serves as a mechanism of control over party members. The business community traditionally consisted largely of Asians, but is slowly being joined by more and more Africans.

Zanzibar has its own House of Representatives. Under the 1979 Zanzibar Constitution which remained in effect throughout 1984, its powers were severely limited and only 10 of its 97 members were directly elected. The new Zanzibar Constitution which was promulgated at the end of 1984 appears to have satisfied broad-based public demand for a more popular, representative, directly elected legislature in Zanzibar. Under the new Constitution the House of Representatives will have from 40 to 55 directly elected members, and only 15 members will be appointed, 10 by the President of Zanzibar and 5 by the Women's Committee of Zanzibar.

Julius Nyerere has run unopposed in the four presidential elections since independence. While voters have the option of voting "no" by secret ballot or staying home, local party officials bring pressure to bear in elections to ensure a high turnout. There have been reports of election fixing and intimidation of village leaders both on the mainland and on Zanzibar. In an effort to break down ethnic and linguistic distinctions, the election code requires that campaigns be conducted only in Swahili and prohibits references to ethnic and regional origin. An appeal process is available to candidates who feel that the code has been violated, and a number of appeals have been successful.

Women have been encouraged to take an active role in politics and government. Using its powers of direct appointment, the Government has ensured that about 20 percent of the membership of village councils is female. In late 1984, there were 2 women cabinet ministers, 1 woman on the 18-member Central Committee of the party, and 13 women on the National Executive Committee.

The party's proposal to change the country's Constitution attracted widespread public debate within Tanzania. Criticism ranged from the basic form of government and the single party political system to the question of the nature of the union between the mainland and Zanzibar. The party and the Government were not required to heed the public's desire, but the constitutions which were promulgated were different from those which were originally proposed. Both the Union Parliament and the Zanzibar House of Representatives introduced amendments to the draft constitutions presented to them. After debate, which was covered extensively by the media, both drafts were adopted with revisions added by the legislators.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Tanzania is a party to U.N. convenants on human rights and has signed but not yet ratified the Organization of African Unity Charter on Human and People's Rights. Tanzania is a member of the UN Human Rights Commission. The International Labor Organization has raised the issue of forced labor a number of times with the Tanzanian Government. In its 1984 report (covering 1983), Amnesty International expressed concern about indefinite detention without charge or trial, and about the involuntary repatriation of refugees to Kenya. However, some of the detainees about whom Amnesty has in the past inquired have been set free, and in 1984 there was an apparent return to a general regard for the rule of law. The Government's concern for international opinion was evident in its decision to release foreigners detained in the economic sabotage campaign provided they left Tanzania, as well as in its decision to release Wolfgang Dourado from detention in May 1984. Individuals can appeal to the Permanent Commission of Enquiry, established in 1965 as a balance to the possibility of abuse of power in a one-party state. Freedom House considers Tanzania "not free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Tanzania had a 1982 per capita gross national product of $270, a 10 percent decline from 1981. More than 90 percent of the population of about 21.1 million are peasant farmers living in rural areas. The official population growth rate was 3.2 percent in 1984; the actual rate is probably higher. Unemployment and underemployment have traditionally caused serious social problems in the cities. These problems have become more acute as the country's economic situation has worsened.

The economy has suffered considerably from a sharp drop in agricultural output. Government pricing policies, traditionally designed to keep consumer prices low for urban dwellers, and a consistent pattern of late payments to producers and shortages of necessary items, such as fertilizers, have contributed to a decrease in the growth of export crops by producers. Many of these farmers have increasingly reverted to food crop agriculture. Recent producer price increases, consumer price hikes, and more systematic payment to producers by state-owned enterprises represent government efforts to reverse this trend.

There has been a parallel decrease in the output of manufactured goods, primarily due to poor management in state-owned enterprises and an inability to finance imports of raw materials and spare parts. The economy has suffered further from worldwide inflation, high energy costs, and continued low prices for export crops.

TANZANIA

The Government continued efforts to expand health and education facilities. Since independence in 1961, life expectancy has risen from 42 to 52.9 years. Infant mortality remains high, largely as a result of malnutrition and the resulting lack of resistance to disease. More than 42 percent of the population had access to clean water in 1982, up from 39 percent in 1975.

Since the institution of free and compulsory education for all in 1977, the vast majority of children of primary school age have been enrolled. There is growing public demand for more emphasis on basic education, and concern over the severely restricted number of places in secondary schools and universities.

Adult education is available and encouraged. According to World Bank figures for 1978, 73.5 percent of the adult population is literate. United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization statistics for 1980 indicate that 79 percent of the adult population is literate, the highest literacy rate in Africa. This represents an increase of more than 69 percent in the literacy rate since 1960. In practice, tradition and social attitudes have seriously limited the participation of women beyond the primary school level. In addition, women suffer disproportionately from the increased abuse of the examination system which now allows a significant number of unqualified students to enter secondary schools.

For most of Tanzania's ethnic groups, women's traditional role has been that of mother and field laborer, and women are still proportionately underrepresented in government, the professions, and in skilled occupations. Social limitations on the role of women are particularly pervasive on Zanzibar. Women in many parts of the country continue to suffer discriminatory restrictions on inheritance and ownership of property because of concessions to custom and Islamic law. Customary and Islamic law in many areas dictate that daughters receive smaller shares of their father's property than do sons. Although the practice is declining, female circumcision is still performed by a minority within some 20 of the country's 120 mainland ethnic groups. Notwithstanding the obstacles, the Government has made progress in its efforts to ensure equality for women, especially in the urban areas where traditional values have a weaker hold on the population. The Union of Tanzanian Women, a wing of the party, is dedicated to the eradication of inequality of women in all spheres of society.

The Asian community, estimated at 40,000, is both culturally and economically exclusive, a business-oriented minority in a society committed to "socialist" policies. Although official government policy is one of equal rights for all citizens, reports of harassment and discrimination against Tanzanian Asians by individual government officials are widespread. In recent months, there have been reports that harassment of the Asian community is declining and the Asian entrepreneurs are being encouraged to invest in areas previously reserved to the public sector.

TOGO

The Government of Togo is authoritarian. Power is firmly centralized in the hands of President Gnassingbe Eyadema who is also Head of the Army and of the only legal political party, the Rassemblement du Peuple Togolais. The Eyadema Government has been in power since 1967. Its legal authority is based on a written constitution adopted by national referendum in 1979. Only party members can participate in the political process. As head of the party, President Eyadema dominates the executive, legislative, and judicial functions of government. The Government's control of the elements of coercion, and the wide recognition that it is willing to use them, are important factors in maintaining its authority. Some administrative arrests and detentions without trial continue.

Togo was officially designated by the U.N. General Assembly as one of the "least developed countries among developing nations" in 1982. Its economy is heavily agricultural, with only one mineral product (potash), and a population which is growing rapidly. Togo's economy is experiencing the restraints currently familiar to countries exporting a few primary products that do not include petroleum. It nonetheless has a flourishing commercial sector and encourages private enterprise. The right to own property individually and in common is protected by the Constitution and is respected by the Government in practice.

The attitude of the Government toward human rights is influenced by a variety of security threats, both internal and external. There is no provision under Togolese law and judicial procedures for protection of the integrity of the person. Habeas corpus is not recognized, no specific law prohibits torture, and the judiciary is not independent. At the same time, the Government of Togo is concerned about its international reputation, and in 1984 played an active role in the U.N. Human Rights Commission.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

During 1984, there were no reported instances of killing for political motives in Togo. There were no reports of deaths perpetrated by opposition groups, insurgents, or terrorists.

b. Disappearance

In 1984, there were no reported instances of disappearances in Togo.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Detention without trial of suspected opponents occurs, and Amnesty International noted in its 1984 report the disappearance of one person in 1983. Togolese authorities have been enjoined by President Eyadema from torturing detainees. However, some released prisoners and trial defendants have claimed to have been beaten and have alleged that their confessions to the police were obtained either by threat or application of physical coercion. There were several such reports in 1984. Poor prison conditions appear to be the consequence of Togo's poverty. Lome's central prison is crowded, and facilities are rudimentary with limited space, light, and ventilation. Food and medical care are reported to be barely adequate by local standards. In facilities outside Lome, reports describe overcrowding, poor sanitation/hygienic conditions, and inadequate food service. At these prisons, families are allowed to visit and to provide food. Only military and paramilitary personnel are granted access to Togo's three military prisons in Lome, Kara, and Temedja. In 1984, there were no new reports on prevailing conditions in Togo prisons, although past reports described forced marches, hard labor, and beatings imposed on prisoners in both military and civilian prisons.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Togolese legal system does not include the right of habeas corpus, nor does this right exist in practice. Detention without trial or administrative detention is used in Togo against those whom the Government considers guilty of "crimes against the public trust" (i.e., corruption or political opposition thought to pose a security threat). Those held in administrative detention are usually not formally charged and cannot obtain redress through the courts. Preventive detention has no fixed term.

Reports indicate that the national gendarmerie has almost unlimited power to arrest and detain persons in Togo for whatever reason. Present practice allows any permanent officer of the gendarmerie to arrest and detain persons without seeking prior permission or submitting a subsequent report. There are reported instances of gendarmerie officers being bribed to make arrests as a solution to personal disputes not having any relation to matters of state, security, or local laws. These arrest cases are not subject to the usual judicial review.

Prisoners accused of crimes unrelated to political security are usually held for no longer than 48 hours prior to indictment or provisional release pending investigation. No legal basis exists to prevent authorities from holding a person beyond that time without charge. Administrative sanctions against officials have also included suspension from their jobs and assignment to residences in their home villages, where they are required to report weekly to the regional gendarmerie office. There was one reported case of this type in 1984. The number of detainees held by the gendarmerie in its Lome prison, outside the structures of local judicial process, varies but has been reported to be as high as 50. Detentions made by the military are processed through the military judicial system. There is no functioning system of bail in Togo.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Pretrial proceedings are sometimes protracted. A crowded court docket and shortage of judges inhibit speedy trials. Defendants accused of nonpolitical crimes are generally accorded the right to a public trial and the right to be represented by counsel. When the defendant cannot afford the cost of an attorney, counsel is appointed by the Government. An attorney is accorded permission to talk with the defendant privately. Defendants and counsel are formally notified of charges in writing. Special courts, handling security, embezzlement of public funds, and violent crimes, observe the same standards of justice as regular courts. Togo's judicial system is not independent of the executive branch and is open to political interference in those trial cases important to the Government.

President Eyadema publicly stated in 1980 that Togo had six political prisoners. This referred to persons convicted of crimes against the state. In January 1982, President Eyadema announced the release of two of these persons, Kouassivi Alphonse de Souza and Abdo de Souza. Unconfirmed reports, which do not include names or any other case specifics, estimate that perhaps up to 200 political detainees are currently held in Togolese prisons. It is unknown what portion may have committed acts of violent protest. The number of political exiles is unknown, but is believed to number about a dozen.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Government does not force individuals to be members of Togo's sole political party. But anyone who wishes to have influence in Togo's political process must be a party member. Monitoring of correspondence and telephones exists. It is generally believed that the Government and political party maintain extensive networks of informants in all important sectors of Togolese society in order to monitor dissident activity. Authorization by a judge or senior police official is normally required for physical searches of private residences in both civil and criminal cases. In matters determined by the Government to involve national security, searches without formal authorization are permitted.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech is restricted, and a free press does not exist in Togo. The Government owns and operates the media and does not permit publication or circulation of material criticizing its policies or officials. From time to time, some cabinet ministers and mid-level government functionaries are accused of corruption and/or ineffective implementation of programs. This is reported in the media. In the past, authorities occasionally have confiscated issues of foreign publications containing articles considered to be critical of the Government. This did not occur in 1984. Academic freedom is permitted only in nonpolitical fields.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The right of assembly is strictly controlled. Prior government approval must be obtained before large groups may assemble. Approval for such gatherings is a political question and is at the discretion of the Government. This discourages protest or political meetings. The single national trade union federation, La Confederation Nationale des Travailleurs du Togo (CNTT), is controlled by the national political party. All workers are required to organize under its banner. The federation serves to convey to workers the Government's views and requirements. On basic economic issues, it does represent workers' concerns to the Government. All major sectors of the Togolese work force are unionized. The right to strike exists and has been exercised on occasion in the past. In such instances, the Government counseled the striking workers and the strike was ended without physical coercion or arrests of striking union members. Professional groups are enjoined to avoid political action. The CNTT is a member of the continent-wide Accra-based Organization of African Trade Union Unity (OATUU).

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion usually prevails in Togo, although Jehovah's Witnesses were banned by government decree in 1979, and are not recognized by the Government of Togo as a religious group which has a right to conduct services, proselytize, or otherwise carry out religious activities in Togo. There are no known prescribed legal penalties for being a Jehovah's Witness. It should be noted that no specific religion is favored by the Government. There is no requirement for religious groups to be licensed by the Government. With the exception of Jehovah's Witnesses, open practice and teaching of religion is permitted. There is no restriction on publishing strictly religious material. Foreign clergy are allowed to proselytize. Local religious groups are permitted contact with similar organizations in other countries. No restrictions exist on religious travel. Religious affiliation is not an impediment or help to advancement in Togo and is compatible with membership in Togo's only political party.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Free movement, including domestic and foreign travel, emigration, and the right to change residence or workplace, is allowed in principle for Togolese and foreigners. Domestic travelers do encounter security and customs-related official roadblocks throughout the country. Passport issuance is restricted by the Government in order to control the number of professional Togolese who emigrate and also to keep known political dissidents under close scrutiny. Except for a few political exiles, Togolese who have chosen to reside in other countries may return at will. Togo has traditionally welcomed refugees, as well as displaced persons.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

President Eyadema holds a monopoly of power in Togo. There are, however, institutions permitting some participation in decision-making where the President is not directly involved. The Political Bureau of the single political party, and the larger Central Committee, permit discussion but ratify all government decisions. The Political Bureau is chosen by the President with the concurrence of the party congress, which meets every five years. The national Constitution specifies that the Central Committee include members who are chosen by the party congress, some of whom are Cabinet members. Others are drawn from the single trade union, youth and women's groups, and private commerce. Membership in the party as a whole is open to all citizens and is estimated at one million. Frequent meetings of the party at various levels serve both to pass down government policy and to a lesser degree to provide the Government some feedback.

Active participants in the party may express their views at party meetings on issues such as the implementation of policy and the behavior of subordinate officials. There is, however, no challenge to the President's political program and the Central Committee's decisions. During the last election in December 1979, President Eyadema was the only candidate. He received 99.7 percent of the votes cast. Togo has a 67-member National Assembly which debates certain categories of proposed legislation as defined by the Constitution, but has no real power to reject proposed laws. The National Assembly can and does require ministers to justify their budgets, and it gives sanction to policy decisions. The President of the National Assembly also holds office in the party Central Committee. National Assembly members are elected on a national constituency basis. Only one party list is presented to voters. All regional ethnic groups and both sexes are represented within the single party political system. The Government thus claims that all groups participate in it. Women have not traditionally had a role equal to men in the political process in Togo, but their participation is encouraged. Currently, 4 women serve on the 22-member Central Committee of the party.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

In October 1982, the Togolese National Assembly ratified the African Charter on Human Rights. Togo also hosted a 1982 conference on human rights practices in Africa. In 1983, the International Committee of the Red Cross established a regional office in Lome. Togo participated constructively in the Human Rights Commission in Geneva in 1984.

The Government of Togo has in the past invited international organizations such as Amnesty International to visit Togo to investigate charges of human rights violations. Since 1979, Amnesty International and the Government of Togo have exchanged public comment about human rights violations in Togo. In its 1984 Report, Amnesty noted its main concerns in Togo to be detention without trial of suspected political opponents of the Government and allegations of torture of detainees, as well as harsh prison conditions. Freedom House rates Togo "not free." There are no internal human rights organizations based within Togo that report on or observe human rights violations.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Togo is listed among the U.N. General Assembly's least developed among developing nations. With a GNP per capita of $344.40 (1982) for a population of 2,927,000 (1984) and a relatively resource-poor land mass of only 56,000 square kilometers, Togo faces many endemic problems and has in addition suffered from declining prices and/or sales of its major exports of phosphates, cocoa, and coffee. In the late 1970's Togo made major investments--many of which have been unprofitable--in industrial projects and tourist infrastructure, but the primary focus of governmental development policies over the past five years has been on increasing agricultural production. Togo is virtually self-sufficient in food in normal climatic conditions, and average diet provided 89.83 percent of caloric requirement (1977).

TOGO

Among the more than 40 ethnic groups in Togo, the coastal southern tribes have historically been the most populous, best educated, and most prosperous due to contact with the West and to more favorable climatic and geographical conditions. One of the Government's major objectives over the past two decades has been to channel resources into the traditionally poorer northern areas of Togo. Despite these efforts, discrepancies persist in the level of economic and social development between the north and the south.

Inadequate governmental resources have limited efforts to improve health and sanitation levels in Togo, although Ministries for Public Health, Social Affairs, and Education typically receive large shares of the regular national budget (40 percent of the 1983 budget). Life expectancy at birth is 48.04 years, and the infant mortality rate is 108.70 per thousand. On a nationwide basis, there is only one doctor for every 18,100 people (1980) and one nurse for every 1,430 people (1980), although the Government operates 21 hospitals and nearly 300 dispensaries or clinics throughout the country's 21 prefectures. For the country as a whole, about 16 percent of the population (1975) has access to safe water; in urban areas, the figure rises to around 50 percent, while dropping to 10 percent for rural areas. Forty-two percent of the urban population is estimated to be living below the absolute poverty level (1978).

Education has also been a major focus of government policy. School attendance is theoretically compulsory until age 15. The adult literacy rate was cited by the World Bank as 15.9 percent in 1970. Since many children beyond normal primary school age (6-11) typically are still enrolled in primary schools, the overall primary school enrollment ratio is 110.52 percent (1981). For males, this ratio is 137.29 percent and for females 85.01.(1981), although governmental policies call for and practice equality of the sexes.

The economic and social rights of Togolese women are spelled out in the "Family and Individual Code" which was adopted in early 1980. Under this code, women's rights include the ownership of property, control of all money earned, and maternity leave benefits. Article 88 of the labor code stipulates equal pay for equal work, qualifications, and production for both sexes. Women dominate local market activities and commerce with Togo's neighbors. They often amass considerable wealth. Formal equality under the law and success in the local marketplace do not mean total equality for all women throughout Togo, however. Traditional law places barriers in the path of women seeking to break with custom. Civil law, for example, recognizes a woman's property rights, but customary law gives all property to the male in the event of separation or divorce. Economic conditions in rural areas also often leave women little time for anything other than carrying water, finding firewood, cooking, caring for the family, and helping to raise food crops. The Government has undertaken a campaign to make women throughout Togo aware of their expanded opportunities under the new family code. The Government's priority emphasis on developing water resources in rural Togo should also help to mitigate one of the most onerous burdens on rural women, that of carrying water over long distances.

UGANDA

The Republic of Uganda is a parliamentary democracy which in 1984 suffered grave human rights violations. It is governed by the Uganda People's Congress (UPC), a party led since its founding in 1960 by President A. Milton Obote. Returned to power in 1980 by national elections after the disastrous Amin years (1971-79), the UPC controls all levels of government, including appointments of local officials. While a national party, it has its primary strength among the northern ethnic groups. The opposition Democratic Party (DP) is weak nationally, but has strong allegiance among 40 percent of the nation's population, especially the Baganda, living predominantly in the 10 south-central districts, an area which includes the capital, Kampala. Within democratic structures, ethnic, military, religious, and economic strife has dominated politics; intimidation and violence, rather than compromise and tolerance, have been frequent.

The Amin years left a legacy of violence, aggravated ethnic conflict, undisciplined but well-armed military units, and economic deterioration that is only slowly and painstakingly being addressed. In 1984 armed insurgency in a portion of south-central Uganda (the so-called Luwero Triangle) grew in intensity and continued to pose a serious challenge to stability. The Government also faced banditry in the northwest, large-scale cattle raiding and accompanying violence in the northeast, and ethnic strife in the southwest. The security and human rights situation has been worsened by an ill-disciplined army. In the Luwero triangle alone since 1981, insurgency--and military reaction to it--has disrupted the lives of possibly 1,000,000 persons, mainly of the Baganda ethnic group. An estimated half-million people may have been forced from their lands, losing virtually all of their possessions. Tens of thousands have died as a result of insurgent terrorism and government counter-operations as well as from starvation, illness, and exposure induced by the upheaval. From December 1983, when Uganda's key military leader, Chief of Staff David Oyite Ojok, died in a helicopter accident, through August 1984 when a new Chief of Staff, Brigadier Smith Opon-Acok was appointed, there was a general decline in the security situation. Following the naming of the new Chief of Staff and other key military promotions, there was an effort by the Government to instill better discipline within the armed forces.

Grave human rights violations in Uganda occurred during 1984, including large numbers of extralegal killings and detentions on the one hand by insurgents and on the other by military, UPC, and government agents. A trend toward the return of law and order, due process, economic recovery, increased security, and respect for human rights in general--all of which showed signs of improvement through late 1983--underwent very serious setbacks in 1984, particularly in the Luwero and Karamoja regions. These were caused by a combination of continued military indiscipline, the inability of the Government or military either to crush or to come to terms with the insurgents, a lack of resources, bureaucratic inefficiencies, general disorganization, short-comings in public-service ethics, corruption, and a lack of faith in the economic future needed to stimulate investment, manage rampant inflation, and restrain capital flight.

UGANDA

On the positive side, the greater portion of Uganda geographically has experienced improved security since the UPC returned to power four years ago. Foreign advisors and experts continued to provide development and emergency assistance as well as military training. With some notable exceptions, soldiers were taken off roadblocks in most parts of the country, returned to the barracks in large numbers, and increasingly went unarmed when off duty. Meanwhile, regular police forces grew in competence and, although constrained in politically sensitive cases, were better able to protect much of the citizenry from lawlessness. Agricultural production outside the Luwero triangle and turbelent Karamoja, for example, has progressed undeterred. In an important political development, the Democratic Party for the first time since 1980 held major public meetings including an international political conference in Kampala.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Extralegal deaths through murder and starvation continued in 1984 and took place in military barracks housing detention centers at Kampala, Luwero, and Nakasongola, as well as at Bondo and Arua in the West Nile. Motives for extralegal killings are varied, ranging from common criminality to guerrilla terrorism and political intimidation and revenge. The number under extralegal military and civilian detention at any one time is estimated to be in the hundreds. In at least one military installation, the survival rate may be less than 50 percent as a result of beatings, starvation, and illness due to overcrowded and unhygenic conditions. Deaths due to such treatment and conditions could have been in the hundreds in 1984. The Government has denied that such extralegal detention centers exist, but has refused the International Committee of the Red Cross access to military and civilian installations alleged to house such centers.

Political assassinations and murder with possible political overtones continued in 1984 from both anti-government and pro-government sides. While precise figures are not known, the number of such deaths could be in the dozens in the Kampala area. In January, four European citizens, one with the United Nations and three under contract to the European Communities, were shot to death in what is suspected to have been an attempt to embarrass the Government on the eve of an international meeting in Paris. The killing of the Deputy Chairman of the Civil Service Commission in April and the murder of a prominent physician and former ambassador in August may have been politically motivated. In September, a Soviet military attache was shot and wounded at his residence in what is purported to have been an assassination attempt. Insurgents killed at least one foreign missionary in the Luwero Triangle and wounded several relief workers in separate incidents.

Reports of disappearances through abductions in 1984, particularly in south-central Uganda, were common. Abductions by the military were also reported in the West Nile region.

Disappearances were the result of guerrilla activity and of unsanctioned criminal activity by military or civilian security forces and for political purposes as well as for extortion. There were also reports of politically motivated abductions and extralegal detention of opposition Democratic Party members in both southwestern and eastern Uganda. Not uncommon, particularly in the Kampala area, were reports of persons who were abducted by military or civilian security elements and who were subsequently transferred to police custody. One such case involved the 19 year old daughter of an opposition Member of Parliament (who himself had disappeared under unexplained circumstances in January when he was accused of implication in the murder of four expatriates). The daughter was held without charge for over four months first by the military and later by civilian intelligence and police authorities in turn. In January 1984, 11 Red Cross employees--7 Ugandan citizens and 4 Europeans--were kidnapped; 9 were released or escaped within 2 days while 2 were held for 3 weeks.

There were reports in 1984 that Ugandan intelligence operators kidnapped Ugandan refugees living in Kenya and allegedly returned them to Uganda where they were jailed without trial. In April 1984, the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees called this matter to the attention of the Kenyan Government.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Credible reports of torture continued to surface frequently. Physical abuse, or the threat of it, is employed as a method of interrogation during extralegal as well as legal detentions. The Government does not sanction such abuse but acknowledges that security forces at times engage in it. Although the Government has stated that persons guilty of inflicting torture will be punished, there is no firm evidence that disciplinary actions against offenders are either consistent or proportionate to the crime. Torture includes burning and beatings which at times result in death. Deprivation of food, water, and medical attention is also employed as a means of torture and execution.

Reports of violence and degrading treatment against displaced persons in the Luwero Triangle continued in 1984. The Government used its own resources, as well as foreign military advisers and trainers, to improve military discipline. Nevertheless many cases of abuse by both insurgents and military elements were reported. Women and young girls in large numbers suffered rape, and there were continued indications of forced concubinage. There were, in addition, reports of children being abducted and forced to work as servants to military members. Looting of homes, schools, churches, farms, businesses, and other private and public property took place both in the Luwero Triangle and in areas of Kampala, much of which was done by people wearing military uniforms. In Karamoja, there were eye witnesses and other credible reports of brutality against the civilian population by both cattle raiders and government security forces.

In some instances, men, women, and children have been forced by some soldiers to harvest without compensation crops which were sold for the soldiers' profit.

UGANDA

In early 1984, the army, civilian intelligence elements, and the UPC youth group continued operations against insurgents and their suspected supporters in the Luwero Triangle. Reportedly non-combatants attempting to flee from insurgent-held territory were indiscriminately fired on by soldiers. An unknown but apparently large number of people were killed. Displaced persons in organized centers were arbitrarily removed in February by both military and civilian intelligence agents, and many have not reappeared despite continued searches. In one case approximately 60 males apparently suspected of being guerrillas or guerrilla sympathizers were removed from among the estimated 10,000 inhabitants of the displaced persons center at Nakitoma in Northern Luwero district. Only one is known to have survived.

Senior government leadership sought to improve discipline and control of both military and civilian security forces. However, in at least three large-scale incidents during the year, there were serious abuses of the civilian population by the Ugandan army. In January, army and militia forces were ambushed by heavily-armed cattle raiders in the Moroto district of the Karamoja region. Casualties were said to be in excess of one hundred. In response, the military attacked and destroyed a village near Kangole, killing an unknown number of noncombatants. Additionally, throughout the Karamoja region frequent military attacks against women, children, and older people were reportedly carried out during the first eight months of 1984 in which hundreds may have been killed. In the Luwero Triangle thousands were unaccounted for during 1984, of whom many may have perished from military and insurgent excesses, starvation, disease, and exposure in a situation exacerbated by the military blocking delivery of emergency relief supplies to the civilian population. Following the February 20 insurgent attack against military and police installations at the district capital of Masindi, in which an estimated 50 military personnel and civilians were killed, the army retook the city after insurgents had withdrawn. The operation lasted two days and an unknown number of townspeople were killed. It is not known whether there was disciplinary action taken against those responsible for the incident. In late May, at the well-known Namugongo religious shrine near Kampala, soldiers responded to a guerrilla attack and assaulted Roman Catholic, Protestant, and Muslim shrines and houses of worship, as well as two boarding schools and nearby villages, reportedly killing more than 100 persons over a three-day period. The Government acknowledged involvement of military personnel in the incident and reportedly arrested some soldiers for participation in the massacre. However, there is no known evidence of further official legal action having been taken.

There were also reports of improved treatment of civilians by military personnel in 1984. In combat areas of the Luwero Triangle and elsewhere, there were non-commissioned and commissioned military commanders who were praised by villagers for attempting to improve military-civilian relations. A military detachment providing security at one of the larger United Nations High Commissioner for Regugees (UNHCR) refugee camps was also praised for carrying out its duties in a professional, community-oriented manner. On balance, by late 1984 there was some evidence that newly promoted army leadership was having some success in improving the military administration and discipline.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Persons in Uganda are subject to arbitrary arrest and detention. There are believed to be 2,000-3,000 persons held without indictment or charges, the great majority because of suspected anti-government activity or sympathy. Their number, however, is not known with any precision. With the cooperation of the Ugandan Government, the ICRC successfully conducted an extensive survey of civil prisons and police stations in 1984. Among those detained for a period of time in 1984 were eight journalists, from three different newspapers, apparently for articles critical of the Government. It is believed that a total of seven journalists are currently detained under the Public Order and Security Act. The journalists are: John B. Kyeyune; Andrew Mulindwa; Anthony Ssekeweyama; David Kasujja; John Owino; Paskale Butere; and John Musoga.

While only the Uganda police have the legal power to arrest civilians, military as well as other non-police security elements routinely place persons in detention at military, police, and intelligence establishments. Search and arrest warrants are seldom used, and persons detained often do not appear before judicial authority within the required 24 hour period. Bail is granted, but reportedly often not in a timely manner or impartially. Intervention by senior government and party officials, as well as bribery or ransom are reportedly often necessary to gain release from either legal and extralegal detention.

Although the Government does not practice either internal or foreign exiling of its opponents, there are some 300,000 Ugandans who have sought refuge abroad. In addition, as many as 500,000 have been displaced by conflict within Uganda. The vast majority of refugees fled to Eastern Zaire and Southern Sudan in the aftermath of the liberation war. About 40,000 Banyarwanda fled to Rwanda and Tanzania in 1982 and 1983. The Government repeatedly has invited self-exiles to return home as part of its policy of reconciliation and no revenge, but there were reports that several returnees to the West Nile region had been killed or beaten. Nevertheless, some 20,000 refugees have returned to Uganda. A number of politically prominent exiles returned in 1984, in some cases receiving wide media coverage. However, for the majority, security and economic conditions, in addition to political opposition, apparently remain primary reasons why they remain abroad in self-exile.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The legal profession is respected, but there continue to be reliable reports of harassment of attorneys, including detention of some lawyers suspected of being politically opposed to the Government or ruling party. Magistrates and judges are reportedly not always independent or impartial.

There are no special courts which hear political or security cases. However, the Government is in the process of establishing a legal department within the military which will have responsibility for implementing court martial procedures. At present, military members enjoy near immunity from civilian authority. There are procedural safeguards patterned after British law, including the granting of bail and appeals to higher courts. However, legal safeguards often are not applied because of the over-burdened court system as well as partisanship of the prosecution, judges, and defense.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

During 1984 there were numerous reports of small-scale raids on the homes of politically active persons opposed to the Government. Many of these may have been simple armed robberies; others seem to have been the outgrowth of personal, economic, or political rivalries. Many reportedly were carried out by heavily-armed men in military and police uniforms. In September a United States citizen tourist in Kampala was assaulted without warning in a public market. He was hit over the head with an iron bar causing a compound depressed fracture of the skull. After the victim fell to the ground, several men dressed in military uniform joined in and began kicking him and then robbed him. It was subsequently revealed that the attackers had mistaken the American for an insurgent leader to whom he bore some resemblance.

In Southwestern Uganda tens of thousands of Banyarwanda, who fled to UNHCR refugee camps in 1982 and 1983, remained in those camps. There was, however, no large-scale communal violence against the Banyarwanda as had happened in the two previous years. Of over 10,000 who have applied for Ugandan citizenship and whose claims were adjudicated by lawyers retained by the Government of Uganda, none has been informed officially of the results.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Criticism of the Government by the opposition in Parliament and in the media is generally tolerated. Political discussions were frequent and generally uninhibited. Kampala's independent press reported extensively on security incidents, alleged abuses of human rights, and what it called shortcomings of government leadership. As noted in 1d, however, in addition to those already incarcerated, the Government detained eight journalists for a period of time in 1984, from three different newspapers, apparently for articles critical of the Government, and these arrests have raised concern for the welfare of the journalists and freedom of the press. There is also evidence that government security elements held DP members under close surveillance, and separately persons were harassed apparently because of their public or private political stands. The international press has been allowed to cover Ugandan events with few restrictions, although entry visas can be difficult, and in some cases seemingly impossible, to obtain (see section 4).

The Government owns and operates radio and television stations and also controls the most widely-read English-language daily newspaper. On occasion, these media include factual reporting of DP positions, but they show a distinct bias in favor of the UPC.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

While subject to political pressures at times, the right of assembly and association in Uganda is generally respected. Non-political events and gatherings--including sports, theater, fund raising events--abound. Political events sponsored by the UPC are numerous throughout Uganda and receive heavy coverage in the government-controlled media. National celebrations, including Independence Day, are given a UPC bias by government officials. In 1984 the opposition Democratic Party held a number of major public gatherings, including a national convention in October. With government cooperation, including disciplined police security, the public rally in Kampala drew thousands of DP supporters to celebrate the 30th anniversary of the Party's founding.

Trade unionism remained limited and subject to government-party influence. UPC "workers councils" continued their attempt to supplant traditional trade unions. Severe shortage of funds within the unions kept them weak. There were a few wildcat strikes during 1984, but organized sector-wide strikes and other labor protests were absent.

Professional associations of doctors, attorneys, engineers, and accountants operate largely without hindrance, as do international associations such as Rotary, Lions, YMCA, and YWCA.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is no state religion in Uganda. Islamic, Christian, and African traditional religions are freely practiced. Conversion between religions is not obstructed. Religious leaders frequently speak out publicly on their followers' welfare, addressing in particular human rights, security problems, and politically sensitive questions. The UPC is to some extent identified with the Church of Uganda (Anglican) while the Democratic Party is identified with Roman Catholicism. However, followers of various religions are found in both parties. Ethnic divisions and traditionally associated religions have spilled over into both local and national politics as the various groups vie for power.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There is freedom of movement, residence, and choice of workplace throughout Uganda. There are, however, restrictions in south-central Uganda because of insurgency and insecurity in the Luwero Triangle. In 1984, while there was an increase in roadblocks in many areas of the country for several months, by October many had been removed.

In the northwest, security conditions did improve in 1984, although possibly 250,000 of a 1980 estimated West Nile region population of 812,000 may remain as refugees in Sudan and Zaire, having fled there following the fighting since 1979 between remnants of Idi Amin's army and the Ugandan army. In northeast Uganda, beginning late in 1983 and lasting much of 1984, killing and marauding by heavily-armed cattle raiders--principally warriors of the Karamojong people--generated a military response. The fighting may have killed thousands and made homeless additional tens of thousands, as both sides failed to discriminate between combatants and noncombatants. In the southwest one of Uganda's largest ethnic groups, the Banyarwanda--whose estimated 1,000,000 population may include 300,000 persons who have sought refuge in Uganda since fleeing Rwanda in 1959--continued to be discriminated against by the population among whom they live, as well as by a Government which publicly has demonstrated little sympathy for them.

Lack of foreign exchange continued to inhibit international travel in 1984, but persons were not otherwise hindered by the Government to travel abroad.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

President Obote and the Uganda People's Congress have ruled Uganda for 12 of the Nation's 22 years of independence. The Parliament comprises 156 members of whom 136 are directly elected, 10 are specially elected by the other members of Parliament, and 10 are appointed members of the military forces. Parliamentary proceedings are patterned after the British system.

Four political parties took part in the December 1980 parliamentary elections--the Uganda People's Congress (UPC) led by A. Milton Obote, the Democratic Party (DP) led by Paul Kawanga Ssemogerere, the Uganda Patriotic Movement (UPM) led by Yowere Museveni, and the Conservative Party (CP) led by Mayanja-Nkangi. The UPC won 74 seats; the DP, 51; the UPM, 1; and the CP, none.

In the 1980 election, a Commonwealth observer team reported flaws but concluded overall that the election reflected a valid political exercise. However, the Democratic Party had by 1984 lost 16 of the 51 seats it won in the 1980 elections and had only a limited voice in Parliament or local government even in DP-controlled constituencies. The decrease was the result of eight "crossovers", two suspected assassinations, three self-exiles, two detentions (one charged and being tried for treason; the other uncharged), and one disappearance. Museveni now leads the insurgent forces, the National Resistance Army, operating primarily in the Luwero triangle region.

While there are members from all ethnic groups in the UPC, the Government's central structure is drawn mainly from northern ethnic groups (including the Langi, Acholi, and Iteso, who together comprise some 20 percent of the country's total population), and is supported by several strong leaders and a portion of the population from the southwest, primarily Banyankole (approximately eight percent of the population). The Democratic Party, on the other hand, draws its leadership as well as its support primarily from southern Uganda, principally from Uganda's largest ethnic group, the Baganda (an estimated 16 percent of the population), as well as a portion of the Banyankole.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government is sensitive to allegations of human rights violations in Uganda appearing in foreign government statements as well as international media. An ambassador was expelled from Uganda in October 1984, allegedly because of media reports in his country critical of human rights practices in Uganda. The Government has disagreed publicly with United States Government statements and western media reports on human rights conditions in Uganda. At the same time, the Government has encouraged and actively assisted a number of journalists from major American and other Western news media to travel to and report on Uganda. Senior government officials made themselves available to foreign media representatives, as well as to visiting foreign officials to discuss the human rights situation in Uganda.

Non-governmental organizations--including religious groups--and United Nations agencies worked with the Government in development programs throughout the country. An emergency relief administration was set up within the Prime Minister's office to coordinate assistance and resettlement for persons displaced in the Luwero Triangle. However, there were government, party, and military elements which impeded both the Government's and relief organizations' efforts to deliver relief to noncombatants. This situation was caused in large measure by the growing intensity of the conflict and government regulation.

The International Committee for the Red Cross (ICRC), which returned to Uganda in 1983 after being expelled in 1981, rapidly expanded its program of prison visits, tracing, family reunification, and emergency assistance in the Luwero Triangle. The largest of the non-governmental organizations in Uganda, the ICRC, at its peak in 1984 had nearly 50 expatriate employees. The Uganda Red Cross continued to be very much in the forefront of relief efforts and other public service work. However, its efforts in the Luwero Triangle were severely reduced during the second half of 1984. The League of Red Cross societies, Oxford Famine Relief, and Save the Children Fund also continued their emergency and resettlement efforts in the Luwero Triangle and elsewhere. Acts of violence against foreign employees of international relief organizations continued in 1984. In January eleven ICRC workers were kidnapped by anti-Government forces. Nine of the ICRC workers were released within 48 hours; however, a Frenchman and a Ugandan were held captive for three weeks. In September a vehicle belonging to a team of German Emergency Doctors (GED) was ambushed in the Luwero Triangle. The ambush resulted in the wounding of a British nurse and a German nurse and the death of a ten-year-old child. This incident played a large part in the GED team's decision to evacuate its hospital on October 4.

Amnesty International in its 1984 report (covering 1983) expressed concern about the wide-ranging detentions without trial of alleged opponents of the Government. Freedom House rates Uganda "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Uganda has great potential, particularly in the agricultural sector, with assets including fertile soil, regular rainfall, and substantial mineral deposits such as copper and cobalt. The Amin era, however, severely damaged productive enterprises, and Uganda remains a very poor country. The Obote Government, with IMF assistance, introduced strong economic reform measures starting in 1981, and growth was impressive in some areas between 1981 and 1983 but slowed in 1984 as the overall security climate worsened. The rate of inflation, which the Government had demonstrated great discipline in curbing, increased substantially in 1984. Coffee is the source of over 90 percent of Uganda's foreign exchange earnings, and economic growth was further hindered by a restrictive internationally agreed coffee export quota.

UGANDA

While there are constraints on the private sector (e.g., the Government monopoly on the purchase for exports of key agricultural crops), the Government encourages a free-market economy. Public and private sector wages were increased significantly in 1984 as were commodity prices paid to farmers. However, taxes were lowered thereby calling into question the Government's ability to pay the higher salaries and prices. By late-October the International Monetary Fund and the Government were meeting to discuss a proposed additional standby agreement. At the same time, the value of the Ugandan shilling deteriorated in the second half of 1984, and there were increasing signs of capital flight, suspected to be generated by corruption and lack of faith in the country's economic future.

In general, while international and bilateral financial and development assistance institutions continued to support Uganda's economic recovery program in 1984 and despite the considerable progress in some areas, overall levels of economic activity remained well below peak levels of the early 1970's. The per capita GNP in 1982 was estimated by the World Bank at only $210.40.

Uganda's estimated population is 14,265,000 with an annual growth rate of 3.2 percent. Life expectancy at birth is 47.8 years. Health infrastructure, which was devastated during the 1970's, continued to be one of the Government's top priorities in 1984. Infant mortality is one example of the breakdown in health care. According to UNICEF, one village near Kampala experienced an infant mortality rate of 32 deaths per thousand in the late 1960's; this had risen to over 90 in 1984. The national average now stands at 92.6. In areas of the Luwero Triangle the rate is estimated to be in excess of 300 infant deaths per thousand. During the year, a major multi-year immunization program was begun by the Government in conjunction with UNICEF and Save the Children Fund. Rehabilitation and expansion of medical services continued focusing on primary health care for children and women. Wide-ranging family planning programs, fully supported by the Government, were also being implemented.

Women are not legally discriminated against or officially restricted from education or employment. They are active in politics at the grass-roots level and hold several senior positions in both the UPC and DP National Executive Committees. Women are found throughout the professions and civil service. In Government, women serve in senior positions in the offices of the President, Vice President, Attorney General, and Chief Justice. In the 24 ministries, the most senior women are the Deputy Minister for Health and the Permanent Secretary for Lands, Mineral and Water Resources. There are 10 additional senior-ranking women in 9 of the ministries.

Along with medical services, the Government has made rehabilitation of the educational infrastructure--internationally renowned in the 1960's and a notable casualty of the Amin period--a top priority. While public funds are short, many self-help groups formed by parents, teachers, religious, and other civic groups provide much of the material and labor to rehabilitate local schools. The Government backs such undertakings enthusiastically. In 1981 the primary school enrollment ratio reached 64.6 percent and adult illiteracy rate was set at 47.4 percent with the female illiteracy rate 14 percent higher than the male.

ZAIRE

Zaire is a centralized one-party state. President Mobutu Sese Seko, who seized power in 1965, heads both the Government (appointing the Prime Minister and his Cabinet) and the party (appointing the members of its highest organ, the central committee). The President has the constitutional power to promulgate laws by decree. In theory, authority is shared with the popularly elected Legislative Council. In practice, however, the Parliament rarely disagrees with presidential decisions, although decrees are usually preceded by consultations with party leaders and legislators.

The single party, the Popular Movement of the Revolution, automatically includes all adult citizens as members. The Executive Council (Prime Minister and Council of Ministers), the Legislative Council (unicameral Parliament), the judiciary, and the only labor union (National Union of Zairian Workers) are organs of the party. The party-state derives its ideology from the ideas and policies of its President-founder, Mobutu Sese Seko. A complex of security organizations, notably the civilian National Documentation Agency, the gendarmerie, and the armed forces (particularly the intelligence branch and the Special Presidential Brigade) share responsibilities for identifying and controlling potential internal and external threats to Zaire and the Mobutu Government. These organizations wield broad powers and influence, which allow harassment and detention of ordinary citizens as well as political opponents of the Government.

Zaire borders on nine other states, some of which have served as bases of operation for secessionist movements and political opponents against Zaire. During the transition from the colonial era to independent statehood, civil war and anarchy overwhelmed the impotent central government. Mobutu's takeover in 1965, with the support of the armed forces, enabled the central government to consolidate power. The country was invaded in 1977 and again in 1978 by rebels based in Angola seeking secession of the southern region of Shaba (formerly Katanga). Of a lesser magnitude, there was renewed instability in 1984, with bombings at the airport, post office, and television station in Kinshasa, and the seizure of the town of Moba in eastern Zaire for two days by a rebel force in November.

Zaire has a mixed economy. Though most mining and transportation activities are state-owned, private enterprise is the rule in the other sectors, with the state often holding a minority equity position in larger firms. Individuals are permitted to pursue business interests in almost all sectors of the economy and are allowed to hold property. Zaire shares the economic problems of most sub-Saharan African countries, including low income levels and inadequate infrastructure and health care. The global recession, compounding more than 10 years of low-base metal prices, has had a severe effect in Zaire. After several unsuccessful attempts, Zaire launched a serious, extensive economic reform program in January 1983.

The human rights situation in 1984 was mixed. Practical limits on political expression and dissent continue. Harassment of citizens by law enforcement personnel and inordinate delays in processing detainees remained serious problems. Still, several positive developments occurred which indicate greater governmental sensitivity to shortcomings in the human rights area. In June, five members of the "Group of 13," former parliamentarians who advocated formation of a second political party, held a press conference with President Mobutu to announce their reintegration into the official party after having been arrested in 1982, then banished to their home villages in 1983. Nonetheless, several members of the Group of 13 continue to be confined to their villages. The International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) resumed its program of prison visits in mid-1984, both in Kinshasa and the interior, with full cooperation from the Government. Justice ministry officials expanded recent efforts to improve the administration of justice at the local level, including a series of seminars for magistrates and lawyers on arraignment procedures and the rights of detainees. Zaire also continues to provide sanctuary to some 300,000 refugees and displaced persons from neighboring countries, notably Uganda and Angola.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

In 1984, as in the previous two years, there were no confirmed cases of killing for political motives, although reports persist that the authorities have carried out such killings. The Government denies that it has killed political opponents of the regime.

b. Disappearance

While rumors of the disappearance of detainees surface from time to time, there were no reliable reports that such disappearances have, in fact, taken place.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Reports persist of physical abuse in jails and harassment of the populace by law enforcement officers. Amnesty International, in its report Torture in the Eighties, claimed that torture and physical mistreatment of detainees is routine in Zairian prisons. Other sources tend to confirm that mistreatment of prisoners, particularly beatings at the time of arrest and during preliminary interrogation, remains a serious problem. The Government does not condone torture and denies allegations that torture is administered during interrogation. Criminal penalties do not include physical punishment or mutilation. However, abuses of all kinds are endemic in Zaire's jails and prisons, with reports of unsanitary and crowded facilities, malnutrition, and starvation among prisoners. The reasons for this situation include lack of concern at senior levels, incompetence, corruption, and budget reductions imposed as a result of the economic reform program. However, there are people working within the Government to improve the treatment of prisoners and conditions within penal institutions. The Minister of Justice has made highly publicized visits to prisons, and administrators charged with corruption have been arrested or transferred.

Discipline among police and soldiers, particularly in remote areas of the country, is poor. Underpaid or unpaid police abuse their authority by harassing and extorting money from civilians. In spite of the popular discontent these practices create, security personnel are rarely punished for misconduct.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Arbitrary arrest and prolonged detention remain common occurrences, affecting most people who come into contact with the criminal justice system. Although habeas corpus and bail do not exist, by law those arrested should be brought before a magistrate to hear charges within 48 hours of arrest. In practice, however, people arrested for whatever reason are often held for months without a hearing. Defendants with the means are known to buy their way out of detention without ever having charges formally filed. Reliable sources estimate that from 50 to 70 percent of the prisoners in Zairian jails have not been formally processed, much less tried.

The Government asserts that it holds no political prisoners. However, advocacy of a multi-party system or opposition to the party-state is unconstitutional. If formally arraigned, most political detainees would be charged with subversion or "attempts against the security of the state." Most such detainees are not formally charged or tried and remain in detention until the President decides to release them. They are generally arrested openly, and their whereabouts is usually, at least unofficially, known. There are no reports of incommunicado detention. Non-judicial sanctions against persons whom officials suspect of threatening state security are authorized by law and range from administrative detention and house arrest to internal exile to native villages and restriction of movement and travel. There were no known cases of exile or expulsion from the country in 1984.

Estimates of people detained or sentenced for essentially nonviolent expression of political beliefs range from 20 to more than 100. As of September 1984, the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) had visited 48 individuals during the year whom it qualified as security detainees. Six of the remaining members of the "Group of 13" and several prominent allies are still in internal exile at their villages of origin. Most family members originally restricted to the village with them have been free to move since July, although a number of them may still be in those villages. Perhaps as many as 40 people were arrested in the wake of 2 bombing incidents in Kinshasa in March and continue to be held without benefit of trial. The Government maintains that these individuals are terrorists, but those allegations have not been submitted to a court. The best estimate of the number of political prisoners is approximately 50.

Both the Justice Ministry and the bar association have launched efforts to improve the system of administering justice, with emphasis on reducing the number of detainees and the length of detention. The first compilation of judicial codes and rules of civil, criminal, and military procedures ever prepared in Zaire is now being published, joining the penal code which was first published in 1983. Training teams composed of jurists and law professors visited all regions in 1984 to educate local magistrates and lawyers on proper procedures and the rights of an accused to a prompt hearing. The bar association has opened a public office in Kinshasa, in an effort to reach and educate people on their legal rights, and is trying to expand this activity to other regions. However, it will take time and improved economic conditions before such steps make major inroads on the abuses caused by those magistrates and police officials who are poorly trained, unmotivated, and corrupt.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Defendants are guaranteed by the Constitution the right to a public trial and defense counsel. In practice, however, most citizens are not aware of those rights, and there are insufficient lawyers in Zaire to provide adequate counsel to more than a minority of defendants. When available, defense counsel generally function freely and without coercion from the Government.

The fairness of trials is uneven. Poorly paid magistrates are known to accept bribes, and it is essentially those unable to pay who are subject to the full rigor of the judicial system. Most defendants who are aware of their rights avail themselves of the right to appeal. Decisions of the court of state security (i.e., those involving national security, armed robbery, and smuggling) are not subject to appeal, although all other procedural protections of the criminal code do apply. Military court procedures also do not provide for appeal. Although normally military courts try only cases involving military personnel, in time of emergency or during military operations the President can suspend civilian courts and transfer jurisdiction over all cases to military courts. There is no indication that any civilian courts were so suspended in 1984.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The party and state security organizations extend down to neighborhood level, and both maintain liaison offices in all government agencies (including military units, universities, legislative council, ministries, etc.). All Zairians 18 years or older are automatically members of the party. Party officials, civil servants, armed forces personnel, parliamentarians, and employees of state enterprises pay an obligatory tax to support the activities of the party's major organs (cadre training, mobilization, propaganda, and youth). These party cadres are also required to attend the party's training institute. Non-attendance can result in reprimands and suspensions. Government employees, market women, and blue-collar workers are often required to participate in public events--parades, official arrival and departure ceremonies, etc.--or risk being suspended from work.

Mail is opened sporadically by security services, some telephone conversations are tapped, and government informers monitor places of residence as well as work. In line with the party-state's ideology of "Zairian authenticity," Zairian men are forbidden to wear ties and women to wear pants or wigs. Zairians are also forbidden to use non-African names.

Judicial warrants are required by law before the police are permitted to search a home, except in cases of threats to national security. In practice, however, police and security authorities enter and search without such warrants. In civil cases where defendants have been found guilty of fraud or embezzlement from the Government, their property and homes can be seized and confiscated without reimbursement.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution guarantees the right of every citizen to express freely his opinions and feelings, whether orally or in writing, but qualifies that and all other rights by the need to ensure "public order and good conduct."

Radio and television are owned and operated by the state. The two major newspapers are privately owned but depend upon significant government subsidies to survive. Publishers and editors are members of the party. The media are expected to promote party ideals and principles. Commentary on politically sensitive internal issues as well as on foreign policy options is discouraged, and direct criticism of the President is forbidden. While journalists are circumspect in their criticism of other high officials as well, criticism of certain government practices, inadequate services, and corrupt officials frequently appears in print.

Media censorship tends to be self-imposed. Journalists must be members of the press union in order to practice their profession, and the threat of ouster from the union and consequent loss of livelihood reinforces self-censorship. Journalists whose writings are considered offensive have been promptly punished, although no such disciplinary actions occurred in 1984. There are several clandestine presses which operate sporadically, printing flyers and handbills critical of the Government and ruling elite. Theater, songs, and organized street gossip are important forms of communicating popular opinions and news.

Artistic and academic freedom of expression are subject to the same restrictions and self-censorship as the press. Mandatory membership in professional organizations and well-developed informer networks serve to discourage dissent. From time to time, books, records, films, and certain issues of magazines are banned. Imported publications, including books and periodicals, are subject to censorship if they are critical of Zaire or its Government.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Only the party and its affiliates may hold public meetings. The Government permits the existence of non-political associations, although these have had meetings disrupted on occasion by government agents because of suspected political activities. The Government also requires that civic organizations notify authorities when they plan meetings or activities involving more than five people. It can also prohibit meetings which continue after 9:00 p.m.

The labor movement in Zaire is confined to one confederation, the National Union of Zairian Workers, which is a semiautonomous unit of the party. The Secretary General is a member of the party's central committee and union officials at the regional level serve on regional party committees. The union provides significant social and educational services to members and their families, and it works with the Government to improve workers' benefits. It is very limited in its ability to promote worker interests which differ from those of the Government and party. The right to strike is embodied in the labor law, but in practice sanctioned strikes have not occurred. The law establishes lengthy arbitration and appeal procedures, during the course of which most labor disputes are resolved. There were short strikes in several sectors of the economy during 1984 which succeeded in focusing government and management attention on union concerns.

At its 1983 session, the International Labor Organization (ILO) in Geneva cited the Government of Zaire for not being in conformity with ILO Convention 29 pertaining to forced labor. This citation stemmed from Zairian legislation providing for compulsory civilian service for graduates from pedagogical and technical institutes, as well as for a government ordinance providing for imprisonment with compulsory labor for tax defaultors.

The over 800,000 workers employed in the public and private sectors are members of the confederation and pay dues to it. However, about 55 percent of Zairian workers are employed in unregulated small commerce and agriculture and are not covered by the union. The leaders of the confederation, who are also party members, ensure that relations with international labor organizations are kept consistent with general Zairian foreign policy. The union participates actively in the International Labor Organization and the Organization of African Trade Union Unity, and maintains relations with various foreign trade union confederations.

c. Freedom of Religion

Zairians enjoy freedom of religion, and there were no reports in 1984 of government interference, in contrast to past years when the Government banned or harassed religious groups or activities considered to present a political challenge. The Government officially sanctions most of the major world religions, and established procedures exist for new churches to obtain legal recognition. Traditional religious groups are tolerated but not officially recognized. The major religions in Zaire are: Catholicism--50 percent, Protestantism (including Kimbanguism)--36 percent, and Islam--5 percent. Recognized religions are free to establish places of worship and to train clergy. Expatriate missionaries are allowed to proselytize and to serve both Zairian and expatriate congregations. Most churches maintain active links with coreligionists outside the country. Religious affiliation confers neither advantage nor disadvantage in secular status.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Travel within Zaire is unrestricted, although the Government does impose the non-judicial sanction of restriction to villages of origin against some dissidents. All citizens, refugees, and permanent residents must carry government-issued identity cards, and police and military personnel often set up checkpoints along major roads to inspect papers. Those whose papers are not in order pay a fine or spend time in jail. In principle, any Zairian citizen may obtain a passport and exit visa, although on occasion government and security officials have impeded issuance in order to prevent or disrupt travel of those suspected of political opposition. A married woman must have her husband's authorization before obtaining a passport, but she need not have his approval to travel.

In May 1984 there were approximately 50,000 Zairians living as refugees in neighboring countries. Refugees have returned under amnesties declared in 1978 and 1983, and negotiations occur sporadically with Angola (20,000), Zambia (9,000), and Tanzania (15,000) for the repatriation of additional refugees. It is likely that many of these refugees could return to Zaire if they wished. A number of prominent opponents of the Government live in self-imposed exile in Europe.

In May 1984, Zaire was providing safehaven to some 300,000 refugees from neighboring countries. Generally, refugees pass freely into Zaire and are allowed to seek employment or settle on farms. They tend to become self-sufficient and integrated into the Zairian economic system within a few years of arrival. The Government considers them to be resettled until such time as they may decide to return to their country of origin. The Zairian Government does not have the resources to provide assistance to refugees, and they depend on the international community for what help they receive. Refugees sometimes suffer, as do Zairian citizens, from harassment by ill-disciplined military personnel. At times, political refugees from neighboring countries (particularly Angola) have been detained for long periods on suspicion of subversion.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The key instruments of power in Zaire are highly centralized and controlled by the President. The government party (The Popular Movement of the Revolution) is the sole political party permitted under the Constitution. The state functions essentially as a basic organ of the party. Party congresses meet every five years under the guidance of the President to set national political guidelines which are then supplemented by resolutions of the party's central committee. These policies are executed by the Prime Minister and Cabinet, who are appointed by the President.

Efforts by a group of ex-parliamentarians to establish a second political party, the Union for Democracy and Social Progress, have been dealt with harshly. Thirteen leaders of the group were arrested in 1982, released from prison in the 1983 amnesty, but relegated to internal exile in November 1983. In 1984, 5 of the 13 made their peace with President Mobutu and were freed. Six of the remaining eight are still in internal exile, with one out of the country and the other apparently at liberty.

Suffrage is universal over age 18 and voting is mandatory, enforced by threat of arrest and fine. In 1982, direct popular elections were held for the first time for municipal councils, rural zone councils, and urban zone councils. The Legislative Council is elected every five years, with the most recent election in 1982. All candidates are screened by the party's central committee, but voters had a choice of an average of five approved candidates per district in the last parliamentary elections. The President serves for 7 years, and President Mobutu, as the only candidate, was reelected in 1984 to a third term with 99.64 percent of the vote.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government maintains that Zaire has nothing to hide in terms of human rights policies, and it denies charges of systematic or serious violations. Its attitude toward external investigation of alleged human rights violations has been mixed. The International Committee of the Red Cros (ICRC) has worked in Zaire for several years, although at times its access has been restricted. In early 1984 there was a period when the ICRC was not permitted to visit all prisons, but this was resolved in a July meeting between President Mobutu and ICRC officials. Since then, the ICRC delegation in Zaire has visited civilian and military prisons in Kinshasa and the interior.

The Amnesty International 1984 Report expresses concern over reports of detention without trial of suspected opponents of the regime, of torture or beating of political detainees, and the deliberate killing or starvation of criminal suspects. Amnesty International alleges that at the end of 1983 over 100 people were imprisoned or restricted for political reasons. The Government contends that the Amnesty International reports are inaccurate and based on misinformation from Zairian dissidents in Europe, and it has not allowed the organization's representatives to visit the country since July 1982. Freedom House rates Zaire "not free."

In May 1984 the Government agreed to allow the Paris-based League of Human Rights to visit the country. However, when it became clear that the purpose was to visit those dissidents who had been relegated to their villages of origin, the visit was not allowed.

Although Zaire has been a member of the U.N. Human Rights Commission (until 1983) and other international forums for dealing with human rights issues, it has not played a leading role. The Government has hewed to a consistent position that international action in the field of human rights should be strictly circumscribed by the principle of non-interference in the internal affairs of sovereign states. Zaire has not been singled out for particular attention in inter-governmental human rights forums.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Zaire is sub-Saharan Africa's second largest country in area and third largest in population (32 million). The annual population growth rate is approximately 2.9 percent, and the per capita gross domestic product was estimated at $187 in 1982, although this figure does not take into account the subsistence economy for which no figures are available. Because of low capital investment and poor maintenance, Zaire's basic infrastructure, particularly transportation, marketing, and communications, has deteriorated steadily since independence.

At the end of 1982 the Government instituted a stringent economic and financial recovery program developed with the assistance of the IMF. Zaire has adhered to that program for two years, implementing measures to liberalize its economy and instituting management reforms. Price liberalization has encouraged greater food production. Limiting public expenditures and employment is another reform measure. While there are now signs the economy is beginning to recover after more than a decade of decline, the short-term social and economic effects of the measures have aggravated the already precarious economic circumstances of many people. The ability of any reform program to have an immediate and marked positive effect in Zaire is limited by the country's structural shortcomings: transportation, public health, and education are key sectors where change will happen only over time, although some improvement in the rural standard of living appears already under way.

Unemployment and underemployment are serious problems. Since independence the percentage of rural population engaged in subsistence agriculture has increased to the present 75 percent. During the past several years industry has operated at only 30 to 40 percent of capacity. Since remuneration in the public service sector is inadequate and sporadic, many civil servants must supplement their incomes through commercial activities. Low salaries and job insecurity have also contributed to corruption in the government and military. Low wage levels will remain a problem, although government reforms include a new minimum agricultural wage, a higher minimum industrial wage, and revision of the government's personnel system to provide comparable pay for comparable work throughout the military and civil service.

Reflecting malnutrition and other health problems, the infant mortality rate in 1984 was 107.6 per 1,000, and the life expectancy at birth 50.5 years. Health care is curative rather than preventive and is extremely limited in quality and availability in both urban and rural areas. On average, in 1976 only 16 percent of the population had access to safe water, with the figure for rural areas as low as 5 percent.

The literacy rate in Zaire for persons over 15 varies regionally, but was estimated at 55 percent in 1980. Approximately 37 percent of women are literate. Four times as many boys as girls are enrolled in primary schools. Lack of books and supplies, high dropout rates at all levels, teacher strikes, poor teacher quality and, most recently, serious reductions in teaching and research staff have contributed to a declining quality of education at all levels throughout the country. Unofficial regional and ethnic quotas designed to protect various ethnic groups from exclusion are implemented in the university system.

The role of women in Zairian society is given great emphasis in party doctrine. Women's rights to own property and participate in the political and economic sectors are protected by law, and a growing number of women work in the professions, government service, and the universities. Nevertheless, custom, tradition, and existing law continue to constrain women from attaining a position of complete equality in society. Women generally earn less than their male counterparts in the same jobs. In addition, married women must obtain their husband's authorization before opening a bank account, accepting a job, or renting or selling real estate.

ZAMBIA

Zambia is a one-party state in which individual rights, basic freedoms, and due process are generally well observed while some political rights are restricted. Much of the decision-making power is concentrated in the hands of the President, Kenneth Kaunda, advised by a central committee of party leaders and governing through a cabinet and a parliament elected through controlled elections. The President possesses sweeping powers--conferred on him by emergency legislation which dates from 1964--to suspend observance of legal rights in the "interest of state security." The Constitution also accords power to the National Assembly to suspend basic constitutional guarantees.

Candidates for political office at any level must be members of the United National Independence Party. No opposition candidate was permitted to run in the October 1983 presidential election. Kenneth Kaunda received a "yes" vote of 93 percent and was reelected for his fifth consecutive five-year term. Elections for the National Assembly were held in single-member constituencies in 1983, with over 760 candidates running for the 125 seats.

In January 1983, the High Court convicted seven persons of conspiring to overthrow the Government and handed down mandatory death sentences. The convictions were appealed to Zambia's Supreme Court, which took testimony in open session during August and September 1984. The Supreme Court will rule on the appeals at a later date. Internal security continues to be a sensitive issue, but there have been no detentions of prominent figures for over three years.

Zambia's economy continues to be severely depressed due to such factors as low prices for the country's mineral exports, a prolonged drought, statist policies which have led to inefficiencies, and a rapid rate of population growth which outstrips productivity. There has been a continuing decline in citizens' standard of living, but the Government is taking steps to improve the management of the economy and to remove some of the agricultural production disincentives, while attempting to maintain delivery of a wide range of social services to the citizenry. Numerous cases of urban crime and smuggling have severely taxed the limited capabilities of Zambia's police and military forces.

Zambian institutions such as the judiciary, press, trade union movements, and churches have come under some pressure from central authorities to be more responsive to the wishes of the Government, but have maintained to the best of their ability their objectivity, status, and influence. There is stiff competition within the single party structure for parliamentary seats; the National Assembly provides a platform for the spirited consideration of issues; the judiciary is independent and takes full account of the rights of the accused; the trade union movement continues to be one of the best organized and most democratic in Africa; and the churches remain a strong independent force which can unite to defend common interests. Zambia continues to serve as a place of first asylum for refugees in the region.

There has been no major change during 1984 in the status of human rights in Zambia. Future trends in human rights practices will doubtlessly be influenced by the nation's ability to cope with its difficult economic problems.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

During 1984 there were no killings in which there was evidence of political motivation or government instigation.

b. Disappearance

No case of politically motivated disappearance is known to have occurred during 1984.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution prohibits torture, but there are credible allegations that police and military personnel have used cruel treatment when arresting persons and have resorted to torture when interrogating detainees. Charges of torture and mistreatment are reported freely in the press when victims register their complaints in court. The courts frequently order investigations to ascertain if confessions or statements were made after torture or physical and mental mistreatment and have consistently rejected statements obtained under duress from arrested persons. Abuses of prisoners are reported to include beatings, pain inflicted on various parts of the body, and long periods of solitary confinement. Prisoners have successfully sued the state for damages as a result of prison abuses. In January 1984, three prison officers were fined and sentenced to one year in jail for putting leg irons on prisoners.

Zambian prisons are overcrowded, understaffed, unsanitary, and lacking in rehabilitative facilities. Medical facilities are meager, but prisoners with serious medical problems are treated in public hospitals. Prisoners are generally segregated by sex, seriousness of the offense, and age group. There is no institutional differentiation in the treatment of different categories of prisoners charged or convicted under civil or criminal statutes, but presidential detainees receive better care in detention than that accorded common prisoners.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Under the state of emergency which has been in effect since independence in 1964, the President has broad discretion to detain or restrict the movements of individuals, a power not exercised since 1982. Detention procedures have been revised to conform with provisions of the Constitution and have increased the President's authority.

The President can incarcerate a detainee indefinitely and is not legally bound to accept a court's acquittal if he still believes that the detainee is guilty. In practice, detainees are almost always released if the court finds in their favor. By law, presidential detainees are entitled to: formal notice of the reasons for their detention; publication of their detention in the Government Gazette; access to counsel; frequent visitation by family and colleagues; immediate representation to the detaining authority; and the right to seek judicial review of the detention order by an independent and impartial tribunal after one year. Presidential detainees must have their cases heard by the High Court and have the right to appeal to the Supreme Court. Habeas corpus is available to persons detained under presidential order, but the Government is not obliged to accept the recommendation of the review tribunal. Six detainees were among the 243 prisoners amnestied in October 1984 in conjunction with Zambia's 20th anniversary celebrations. It is estimated that there are fewer than 15 presidential detainees currently held in Zambia.

There was no significant use of the President's detention authority in 1984. However, detainees from previous years face a slow process of investigations and legal action which can take anywhere from a few months to several years. Detainees can sue the state for wrongful detention and false imprisonment, and several did so in 1984.

Under the state of emergency, law officers and defense personnel have extraordinary powers. Police officers of assistant inspector rank and above may arrest without a warrant and detain an individual for up to 28 days if the officer has reason to believe grounds exist to justify a presidential detention order. However, police must within 14 days provide the detainee with reasons for his detention, or his incarceration is void. This requirement is followed rigorously.

Security officers have broad powers of search, and sometimes act without warrants when looking for smugglers or illegal aliens. During 1984, more than 3,000 persons residing illegally in Zambia were rounded up in police sweeps, especially in Copperbelt province, and were later deported. The majority of these aliens were deported to Zaire, with others being sent to Tanzania and a number of other nations.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Zambian judiciary system consists of a Supreme Court with appellate powers and a series of lower courts--of which the High Court is the most important. Presidential detainees are not automatically guaranteed public trials, but the majority have been tried in public. The safeguards of English common law are provided in court cases not involving presidental detainees. Independent observation confirms the independence of the Zambian judiciary from executive branch influence. The President's power to appoint and transfer judges has sometimes been cited as having the potential to influence judicial decisions. However, there is no evidence that such power has swayed court actions.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Zambian Government does not require membership in political organizations, and usually does not monitor correspondence or telephones, or otherwise interfere in family life. The sanctity of the home is generally respected, except in isolated incidents relating to the national emergency or to roundups and deportations of illegal aliens. In these cases, security forces often do not have search warrants. Such warrants can be issued by magistrates or police officers above the rank of sub-inspector.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

There is considerable freedom of press and speech in Zambia, and the press regularly reports criticism of government activities expressed by sources ranging from elected officials to average citizens. The two national dailies are owned by the Government and party respectively, but substantial commentary critical of party and government performance is permitted. The Times of Zambia, the party paper, is generally independent of outside direction. The papers discuss economic policy, corruption, and poor administration. However, direct negative comments concerning the Head of State, the concept of the one-party state, and the national philosophy, "Humanism," are prohibited. Journalists and commentators know the limits of criticism and are wary of reporting which could lead to charges of libel and slander. An independent biweekly paper sometimes critical of official policies is published by an association of churches, and two other independent papers focus on mining and financial subjects. Television and radio are owned and operated by the Government; frequent panel discussion programs provide for a wide range of views on Zambian issues.

While the possibility of censorship of foreign publications and news items exists, it is seldom invoked. Academic freedom is highly respected in Zambian society, and Zambian educators are outspoken in their commitment to an educational system free of extraneous influence. There is little or no governmental interference in matters relating to curriculum, student selection, or faculty assignment.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Police permits are required for meetings and rallies or marches. These permits are issued routinely, unless the Government believes that the proceedings are likely to be directed against local authorities. While there is a ban on all political activity outside the one-party structure, Zambia has a profusion of trade associations and professional groups which can serve as unofficial pressure groups on various economic, political, and social subjects.

Zambia has a history of strong labor union organizations, dating from the establishment of large copper mines during the 1930's; Zambia's 18 national labor unions, which are organized by industry or profession, are all members of the Zambia Congress of Trade Unions (ZCTU). Member unions defend worker interests, especially on wages and conditions of service, and have the right of collective bargaining. Under existing legislation, strikes are permitted only for specific reasons and only after all other recourse has been exhausted. Virtually all strikes are illegal, since they almost always commence before the process of mediation has run its course. However, the Government has relied on persuasion and continued mediation to end strikes once begun. There were no major labor disturbances during 1984. The trade union congress is not controlled by the party or the Government, and union leaders frequently criticize government policy on such subjects as wages, economic policy, conditions of service, and labor representation on party and government organs. Internally, the trade union congress is democratic and regularly conducts open elections to select its leadership.

The ZCTU is a member of the Organization of African Trade Union Unity (OATUU).

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is constitutionally guaranteed and has been supported by President Kaunda. Zambia has no state religion, and adherence to a particular faith does not confer either advantage or disadvantage. Christian missionaries from a wide variety of faiths operate freely in the country. While Jehovah's Witnesses are prohibited from proselytizing, the sect functions openly and its freedom not to participate in various secular activities such as voting, singing the national anthem, and saluting the flag has been upheld in the courts and supported by senior party leaders. Lay associations and religious youth groups operate independently of party control or influence.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The President may, under emergency powers, restrict the movement of individuals within Zambia. The Government also reserves the right to refuse or to withdraw passports to prevent foreign travel by individuals whose activities are considered inimical to Zambian interests. However, strict currency regulations also serve to inhibit foreign travel or emigration.

Acquisition, loss, and revocation of citizenship is governed by constitutional provisions and laws administered by the Citizenship Board. However, the President also has power to grant or revoke citizenship on an extraordinary basis.

Zambia has long played host to a considerable refugee and asylum-seeking population that originates in several strife-torn southern African nations. The United Nations High Commission for Refugees (UNHCR) is conducting a refugee census, but estimates indicate that there are approximately 103,000 refugees in Zambia. The largest group of refugees is from Angola, with significant groups from Zaire, Namibia, and South Africa. Smaller numbers are from Malawi, Mozambique, and Zimbabwe. Many of the Angolans and Zaireans have spontaneously resettled in Western and Northwestern provinces since the ethnic compositions on both sides of the border are similar. The Zambian Government operates two large refugee resettlement centers and the South West African People's Organization operates one camp. Urban refugees number approximately 700.

Despite Zambia's reputation as a refugee haven, economic difficulties and political pressure from the refugees' countries of origin resulted in several instances of forced repatriation during 1984, especially to Angola, but also to Zimbabwe. The UNHCR protested to the Zambian Government the forced repatriations to Angola in early 1984, which apparently involved several planeloads of people.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Since 1973, the United National Independence Party, with an estimated membership of less than ten percent of the adult population, has been Zambia's sole legal political party.

ZAMBIA

Power is concentrated in the hands of the President as leader of the party and chief of state. He plays a dominant role in determining the membership of Zambia's top executive institutions, the party central committee and cabinet, although traditionally both bodies contain a general balance of regional and tribal representation.

Candidates for political office at any level must be members of the party and they are subject to close examination for suitability by senior party authorities. In practice, however, the Zambian political system is open to individuals of somewhat divergent opinions provided they are willing to work within the one-party structure and not challenge the President's preeminent position. In the latest parliamentary elections in 1983, 760 candidates contested 125 seats; 40 incumbents were defeated, including 7 ministers of state.

The National Assembly is reflective of constituent interests and sometimes thwarts or modifies executive branch policies and programs. In 1984 the Assembly voted down a motion for adjournment by the Prime Minister, for example. Presidential and general elections are by universal suffrage but the numbering of ballots, which could be cross-checked against voter registration numbers, could undermine the secrecy of the ballot. As noted elsewhere, voters can choose among multiple candidates for the Parliament from the one party. In the 1983 presidential election, voters had the option of voting for or against the single candidate, or abstaining. A total of 63.4 percent of registered voters went to the polls, of whom 93 percent voted in favor of the President.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

While there is no public record of the Zambian Government having been subject to such investigations, queries, or messages during 1984, the Government generally neither encourages nor hinders investigations or visits by organizations such as Amnesty International. In its 1984 report, Amnesty International expressed concern about the detention without trial of alleged political opponents of the Government and about allegations of cruel, inhuman, and degrading treatment of certain prisoners. Freedom House terms Zambia "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Zambia is in the midst of a prolonged economic recession, marked by high inflation, serious unemployment, and scarce financial resources. The application of various economic policies along socialist or centrally managed lines since independence has not lived up to expectations. Real per capita income has fallen below the level at independence, and due to depressed prices for Zambia's copper exports, even total real national income remains below the level reached in 1977. In addition, a drought which has lasted three years has reduced the production of food and forced further reliance on food imports. The expansion of social welfare programs has, as a result, had to be subordinated to overall economic needs.

In the past two years, however, the Government has restricted public spending, reduced government subsidies, raised farm producers prices, devalued the currency, and come to terms with the International Monetary Fund for an approximately $225 million standby program extending to April 1986. These actions represent important initial steps toward economic stabilization.

The average income of rural inhabitants is estimated to be substantially less than one-third the average earnings of urban dwellers. This imbalance has generated heavy rural-to-urban migration (over 40 percent of the population is urban), exacerbating already high unemployment and crime rates in urban areas. Nationwide, unemployment is well over a third of the potential work force.

In addition, the gap between the rural and urban areas in terms of income, education, housing, nutrition, and the availability of public services is considerable. Eighty-six percent of the urban population has access to safe water, for instance, as opposed to 16 percent of rural dwellers (1975). Within the population there are also significant inequalities. The top 20 percent of households claims over 56 percent of the total income, while the bottom 40 percent gets only 11 percent.

Women participate increasingly in Zambia's social, economic, and political life. They hold some senior positions in the party, the Government, and the judiciary, and are gaining increasing representation in the professions and higher education. At the party's 1983 convention, a subcommittee on women's affairs was created, which increased women's influence on the Central Committee. The party has also increased the number of women on the 25-member Central Committee from two to four. Nevertheless, the majority of Zambian women still occupy traditional roles.

Under statutory law, women generally enjoy full equality with men. Customary law and practice still compete on a de facto basis in most rural areas with Zambia's Constitution and codified laws. Some customary statutes place women in subordinate or unequal status in property inheritance and marriage. The Law Development Commission is seeking ways to remove such anomalies.

According to 1979 statistics on school enrollment as a ratio of population in age groups, about 99 percent (versus 114 percent of males) of Zambia's primary-age females are enrolled in primary school. Moreover, female students can be admitted to secondary school with lower passing marks than male students as part of Zambia's "affirmative action" program. However, because many women are burdened with heavy household duties, their opportunities for advancement lag behind those of men. Within the context of Zambia's traditional society, their primary role is to have children. Zambia's population growth rate, which stood at 2.8 percent in 1970, is now 3.2 percent, according to 1984 figures. From 1969 to 1980 there was a 40 percent increase in population. The fertility rate in 1979 was 6.1 live births per woman, one of the highest in the world. Life expectancy at birth is 51.6 years. Barring a dramatic turnaround in Zambia's economy, its ability to sustain even existing social services will be seriously strained in the future by its rapidly expanding population.

ZIMBABWE

Zimbabwe has a parliamentary system based on the Westminster model, as established in the 1979 negotiations at Lancaster House that led to independence. Its Government is controlled by the Zimbabwe African National Union (ZANU)--led by Prime Minister Robert Mugabe--which won an outright majority (57 of 80 "African" seats) in the 1980 general election. Since independence, Mugabe's Cabinet has included members of the Zimbabwe African People's Union (ZAPU), led by Mugabe's rival Joshua Nkomo, and several whites, who are independent members of Parliament. In November 1984, however, Mugabe sacked two ZAPU ministers for their party's alleged support of dissidents who had murdered several senior ZANU officials, and replaced them with ZANU loyalists. Under Prime Minister Mugabe, ZANU has stated its intention to transform Zimbabwe into a one-party state, with a party broad enough to encompass a diversity of opinions.

Born of a 15-year civil war, Zimbabwe came to independence in 1980 with a heritage of white rule based on institutionalized racial, social, and economic discrimination against the majority black population. At the same time, independent Zimbabwe also inherited the strongest and most complete economic infrastructure in black Africa, mineral resources, a strong agricultural base, and a strong manufacturing sector--all with significant capacity for growth and for amelioration of economic imbalances. In 1983-84 the growth of the economy has been hindered by the worldwide recession, continued drought, and internal security problems.

The present Government has respected the Lancaster House Constitution in preserving multiracial democracy and the rights of property, but has maintained a legal State of Emergency, in force since 1960. These emergency powers allow the Government to override constitutional guarantees of several basic human rights, such as freedom from arbitrary arrest and the right to a prompt and fair trial. They have also been used to detain without trial several prominent opponents of the Government, including the Prime Minister of the predecessor regime, Bishop Abel Muzorewa, and to intimidate other political opponents. Government efforts to control dissident activity and banditry, concentrated primarily in Ndebele-speaking areas, have strained relations between the two major black parties and elicited international attention due to the substantial violations of human rights which resulted.

There are three branches of the security apparatus: the police and its criminal investigation department, which are responsible for general criminal cases; the Central Intelligence Organization, which is responsible for investigating security matters; and the armed forces, which have sometimes been assigned responsibility for enforcing internal security, especially in dissident-affected areas. All three branches have to some degree violated human rights during 1984. Most of these abuses were concentrated on ZAPU, the ruling party's primary opposition, and its largely Ndebele-speaking supporters.

In February the Government imposed a curfew on a 4,000-square-mile area of Matabeleland South province to curb activity by dissidents. Despite the curfew and a government-imposed news blackout, there were many credible reports that the security forces were using unnecessary force and violating the rights of the inhabitants in their search for dissidents. In June, approximately 100 civilians were killed in Midlands province during riots by ZANU members against members of opposition parties.

The judicial system continues to function independently of government, frequently ruling against the state on sensitive issues and defending human rights through the rule of law. The opposition political parties--ZAPU, Muzorewa's United African National Council (UANC), a splinter ZANU group, and the all-white Conservative Alliance--also continue to function, although their activities are monitored by the security services and their supporters often harassed. An independent group of white MP's is also active. Nevertheless, Nkomo organized a well-attended ZAPU National Congress in Harare in October, and Bishop Muzorewa, after being released from detention in September, has held several large public gatherings. All parties plan to contest national elections scheduled for early next year.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

The Zimbabwe Government continued to face a serious security problem in the southwestern part of the country during 1984. Targets of dissident attacks were primarily civilians, including ZANU party officials, rather than military personnel. Knowledgeable sources outside the Government estimate that up to 50 civilians died during the past year as a result of these attacks. These same sources believe that the higher number of deaths for which the Government blames the dissidents--over 100--includes murders committed by common criminals with no political motivation and Zimbabwean soldiers acting within or beyond their orders. At the same time, government efforts to cope with the dissident problem resulted in the deaths of approximately 100 to 150 civilians, according to credible sources. Many of these civilians were being held in detention centers under suspicion of aiding dissidents and some died as a result of injuries inflicted by the military and/or poor conditions at these camps.

Approximately 100 civilians--mostly members of minority parties (UANC and ZAPU)--died in June during anti-opposition party demonstrations by ZANU members in several towns in Midlands Province. Senior ZANU officials who hold cabinet positions have been accused of inciting the demonstrators through incendiary speeches. There are also reliable reports of their helping to arrange the demonstrations, including transport for party youth. Although placing the bulk of the blame on the opposition, particularly for the assassination of ZANU officials, senior government officials later condemned all forms of political violence.

The Government does not condone the killings of civilians by its security forces, but is widely believed to have instructed its police to stand aside during the June demonstrations. Since then, the Government has arrested four soldiers who are alleged to have murdered four civilians in Matabeleland in 1983 and some ZANU officials alleged to have attacked minority party members.

b. Disappearance

In 1984, sources estimate that as many as 5,000 civilians may have been arrested or detained by official security forces, mainly in Matabeleland, without public announcement. These sources indicate that the Government continues to hold an undetermined number of people but that the large majority were released within weeks of their arrest. Despite the large numbers involved, there have been no reports of unexplained disappearances during the past year. Two Zimbabwean rebels were sentenced to death in November 1984 for the kidnapping of six foreign tourists in 1982 (including two Americans) who are still missing.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Minority party members of Parliament and others have accused the Government of torture. Reports from a variety of sources indicate that Zimbabwean security forces have been responsible for a broad range of mistreatment of large numbers of civilians--almost entirely Ndebele-speaking--who were suspected of being dissident supporters. Types of mistreatment included torture with electric shock equipment, water, plastic, and chemicals; cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment such as repeated beatings and rape; and confinement in small cells with little or no ventilation and detention for several days in open-air cages. Reliable sources indicate that at least 5,000 civilians experienced some sort of mistreatment at the hands of Zimbabwean security forces and that between 100 and 150 died as a result of this or other poor conditions while in the hands of government forces. On the other hand, all detainees are not routinely mistreated. Bishop Muzorewa, for example, appears to have been well treated and acknowledged this fact publicly after his release.

In 1984, the Government continued its investigation of allegations of abuses during the security crackdown in 1983, but its report has not been made public as promised. A limited number of the security forces have been brought to trial for their alleged mistreatment of civilians, but not, according to available information, for mistreatment at detention centers.

Prison conditions in Zimbabwe are spartan but not harsh. Diet, clothing, and exercise are governed by regulation; deprivation of necessities is not used as a disciplinary measure. Living conditions are sometimes crowded, with as many as 100 prisoners sharing a large room. Medical service is available. Many prisoners are required to do manual or farm labor at prison facilities. Much less is known of conditions and treatment in maximum security prisons, where "security risk" prisoners are confined and in which abuses are alleged to have occurred.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Emergency powers have been in effect since 1960. The Emergency Powers Act empowers the Home Affairs Minister and any police or Central Intelligence Organization official to detain any person in the interest of public order and safety. "Undesirable inhabitants" may be deported under orders of the Home Affairs Minister. A tribunal of independent jurists must review all detention orders within 30 days. If the tribunal finds no merit to the case, the detainee is to be released, but the Government can override the tribunal's decision. If the tribunal recommends in favor of detention, it continues until revoked by the Minister or until the detainee is indicted. The tribunal must review all standing detention orders every 180 days. The Government has, as a rule, adhered to these legal formalities, although there have been some delays. A detained person is entitled to hear the reasons for his detention not later than seven days after arrest. The detainee is also entitled to see an attorney and is entitled to compensation for unlawful arrest and/or detention.

Zimbabwean law provides that an arrested person may demand, in court, that evidence leading to his arrest be presented. In the case of detention orders, however, the writ of detention issued by the Home Affairs Minister has been deemed sufficient to meet the requirements for evidence.

At least 5,000 people are believed to have been detained during the curfew in Matabeleland. At any one time the number of people under detention has probably averaged between 800 and 1,200 through 1984. Most of the detainees were never formally charged and their detention was never widely known. Others, such as UANC leader Bishop Muzorewa--who was held for ten months until his release in September--and four leaders of ZAPU's former military wing, have drawn considerable international attention. The latter remain in detention on the advice of the detention review tribunal.

Between 10 and 20 persons were redetained in 1984 after being acquitted in court. Most of those were Ndebele-speakers who had been tried in Bulawayo courts. The best known example concerns four ZAPU members who were alleged to have been involved in an attack on the Prime Minister's residence but who were acquitted of charges of terrorism and treason. Tried in Harare, they were redetained two days after being acquitted. They have since been released.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The constitutional guarantees of a "fair hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial court" remain in effect and are, in the vast majority of cases, respected. Most major cases are held in open court, but an increasing number of those on sensitive security matters are being held in camera.

Two major politically sensitive cases that were ruled on by the Supreme Court this year reconfirm that the judiciary continues to function independently of the Government. The Government has made an effort to appoint well-qualified judges with experience, even if this has meant recruiting expatriates. Several judges have emphasized their freedom from government interference in those cases over which they have presided.

Approximately 200 people were tried for "political" crimes in 1984. Most of them were charged under the Emergency Powers Law and Order Maintenance Act for their alleged involvement with dissident groups. No more than 10 percent of them were represented by counsel.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution protects citizens from arbitrary search or entry. Under the Emergency Powers regulations, however, any police officer may without warrant stop and search any person or enter any area where he has "reasonable grounds" for believing evidence of a crime may exist and seize the evidence. There have been credible allegations of arbitrary intrusion into homes and interference with privacy by government authorities. Most relate to the conduct of the security forces in operations against dissident groups in Matabeleland. Well-placed sources have reported that security force personnel have employed coercive tactics to persuade Ndebele-speakers in Matabeleland to take up ZANU membership.

There have been no allegations of electronic surveillance by Zimbabwean authorities. On several occasions, however, Zimbabwean citizens have claimed that authorities have opened or confiscated mail.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Although the Government has taken steps to restrict these rights from time to time, considerable freedom of speech and of the press exists in Zimbabwe. Opposition viewpoints continue to be freely ventilated in Parliament, although these are not always reported in the press, which generally adheres closely to the Government's line. Two prominent exceptions are a Catholic Church-sponsored monthly magazine (Moto), which often includes articles critical of government policies, and a private weekly financial newspaper (The Financial Gazette).

Criticism of the Government is tolerated, but personal attacks on the President are prohibited by law. Senior officials of the Mass Media Trust, established by the Government to oversee the management of the country's major newspapers, have sometimes interfered in editorial policy at the newspapers. Two pseudonymous columnists for the major Sunday newspaper, who frequently wrote articles critical of the Government, no longer appear in print. This has served to reinforce the willingness of other reporters and columnists to practice "self-censorship" on contentious issues and to stress ZANU positions. Nevertheless, it appears that most senior editorial personnel generally share and support the Government's policies and programs and do not hesitate to criticize incompetent or corrupt officials.

The Zimbabwe Broadcasting Corporation is wholly owned by the Government. Although editorial policy is supposed to be insulated from politics by a management board, in practice both radio and television cleave very strongly to the line laid down by the Government and by Prime Minister Mugabe's ZANU party, giving prominent coverage to ZANU party rallies and meetings, while rarely mentioning those of any other party.

The Government has relaxed the application of the "Kadoma Declaration," which bans entry into the country of journalists based in South Africa, but has left it in force and occasionally applies it when a reporter requests accreditation. During the curfew in Matabeleland South early in 1984, journalists were prohibited from entering the area where the security forces were operating. When they were finally allowed into the area, after the partial lifting of the curfew, it was as part of an army-escorted tour.

The University continues to enjoy substantial academic freedom, but there are indications the Government is stepping up its role in molding university-level courses to fit its socialist philosophy. A government-funded "Institute of Development Studies" was recently inaugurated to propagate socialist philosophy for the country's development program.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution provides the right of assembly or association, but there are restrictions in practice. Persons who intend to hold public political meetings must obtain permission from police authorities or the Ministry of Home Affairs. Officials from all major opposition parties have criticized the Government for hampering their plans to hold such political rallies. According to most observers, the record continues to indicate a disproportionately high number of disallowed meetings among these opposition groups.

Some minority party members are increasingly finding that their political association carries considerable liabilities. There have been credible claims that they and/or their family members have been subjected to repeated harassment by persons affiliated with the ruling party. In addition, homes have been damaged or destroyed by groups of ZANU youths. There have also been instances where minority party members have been denied access to a variety of public services, such as health care or public transportation, or have found employment opportunities limited.

Following the riots in several urban centers in Midlands province in June, provoked by the murder of a popular ZANU official and his family, ZANU members attacked ZAPU and UANC supporters, and the Government placed a ban on all political meetings by ZAPU. This ban was lifted in early October.

Other associations not of a political nature appear free of official restrictions and meet openly when and where they choose. This includes religious, professional, fraternal, and leisure organizations of all types, which flourish in Zimbabwe. The Government does not sponsor any so-called "mass" organizations aside from its youth and women's leagues.

The Government has sponsored the establishment of an umbrella labor organization, the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions (ZCTU), in order to consolidate the fragmented labor movement and bring all unions onto its roster. However, recalcitrant unions have shown no eagerness to join the Congress. The Minister of Labor recently criticized the Congress for its inability to organize itself effectively and for several instances of corruption. Proposed legislation to make membership mandatory has still not been brought forth. The Government has shown caution in using its other powers (e.g., subsidies) to force unions to affiliate with the Congress. Aside from the Congress, however, individual unions can be effective representatives of their members and have had some success in defending members' interests. The Congress maintains friendly relations with trade union organizations from both East and West. It is also a member of the continent-wide Organization of African Trade Union Unity.

ZIMBABWE

There are several professional or trade associations which operate effectively on behalf of their members. Notable among these are the Commercial Farmers' Union and the Confederation of Zimbabwe Industries, both of which have easy access to senior levels of government and are respected for their expertise. There are no known restrictions on affiliation between these or other Zimbabwean organizations and recognized international bodies.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is fully respected in Zimbabwe. There is no state religion, nor is any one sect or belief favored by government policies. All religious denominations are permitted to practice openly and to teach their beliefs. Religious groups maintain links with outside coreligionists and hierarchies.

While the ruling party, ZANU, has proclaimed that it intends to establish socialism based on Marxist-Leninist principles, it has so far taken no steps to restrict religious freedoms. There have been several instances, however, when ZANU youths have disrupted church services and forced attendance at ZANU rallies.

Methodist Bishop Abel Muzorewa was detained for 10 months allegedly for his political activities and suspected collusion with South Africa. The Government is suspicious that he uses his church meetings as a cover for political rallies. There have been instances when members of the ZANU Youth League harassed Methodist churchgoers for affiliation with the UANC, and the police have not been visibly vigorous in controlling such incidents.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Aside from scattered roadblocks or curfews imposed when dealing with specific security problems, movement within the country is unrestricted, and there are no limitations on where one may live or work. The Government has on occasion moved to expel squatters in both urban and rural areas when they illegally occupy farmland or when their presence creates a health hazard.

The primary restriction on emigration and travel outside the country is financial, as the Government limits the amount of foreign exchange that Zimbabweans may spend overseas each year. There are severe restrictions on the amount of cash or valuables, beyond household effects, which may be taken when leaving the country permanently. Zimbabwe continues to welcome the return of citizens who had been living, studying, or working outside its borders. These returnees have been integrated back into its society as fast as their skills and the community's resources permit.

In the past year, over 50,000 persons from Mozambique have migrated into the eastern part of Zimbabwe to avoid the combined effects of drought and political instability in their country. At first, many of them were rounded up by police and sent back across the border. Since then, however, the Government has decided that these persons meet the U.N. and OAU definitions of "refugees," and camps have been established to accommodate them. Most still have family ties in Mozambique and intend to return there when they can. The Government has indicated its willingness to continue to permit the Mozambicans to stay until they can be voluntarily repatriated. International assistance is being provided to them in the interim. There are still reports of Mozambicans being turned back across the border, however. On the other hand, the Government has successfully applied pressure on Zambia and Botswana to return certain Zimbabweans who have taken refuge in those countries. In some cases, the Government has claimed that the persons involved were implicated in criminal activities, although these individuals have claimed to the local authorities in their countries of refuge that they were wanted only for their political affiliations or activities.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Zimbabwe is governed, under a Westminster-style parliamentary system, by the Zimbabwe African National Union (ZANU) led by Prime Minister Robert Mugabe, which won 57 of the 80 seats reserved for blacks in the House of Assembly in the 1980 general election. The Zimbabwe African People's Union (ZAPU) of Joshua Nkomo won 20 seats, and Bishop Abel Muzorewa's United African National Council (UANC) won 3 seats. An additional 20 seats are reserved under the Lancaster House Constitution for representatives elected by the white voters. Mugabe included Nkomo and other ZAPU members in his first cabinet, but several were expelled in 1982 for alleged anti-government activity on the part of ZAPU. Their ZAPU replacements, except for two deputy ministers, were sacked in November 1984 when Mugabe accused ZAPU of complicity in the murder of a senior ZANU Senator by dissidents. The Government also includes two Ministers and one Deputy Minister drawn from the white community.

Prime Minister Mugabe, as leader of the largest party, which draws its strength from the largest major ethnic group in the country, has often stated his desire and intention to establish a one-party state in Zimbabwe. While he has been careful in the past to couple that statement with an affirmation that any such change would be achieved by constitutional means, he has suggested that if his party should win a massive victory in the next general elections, scheduled for early 1985, he would take that as a mandate to bring about a one-party state more promptly.

Zimbabwe has held only one general election, which took place immediately before independence in 1980. It was generally perceived by outside observers to have been free and fair. The next general election is expected to take place in the first half of 1985. There have been several by-elections for vacated parliamentary seats and municipal elections in 1984 which have generally been conducted fairly. In the various municipal elections, ZANU candidates won in those areas where the party is strongest, but they were defeated in predominantly-ZAPU Bulawayo, Zimbabwe's second largest city. There have been reports of various forms of electoral intimidation being applied in more rural areas by ZANU cadre or security forces.

Parties outside government, and some individuals not affiliated with any party, have not hesitated to voice their opinions on issues both large and small. This is especially true in Parliament, where there has occasionally been dissent within the majority's ranks as well.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Zimbabwe Government is sensitive to criticism of its human rights practices. It has failed to publish a report from a government-appointed commission of inquiry that was created in 1983 to investigate alleged human rights violations in Matabeleland earlier that year, despite assurances by Prime Minister Mugabe that such a report would be made public. The Government has also failed to respond to repeated queries on alleged human rights violations from non-governmental organizations and private citizens.

Within Zimbabwe, the most notable organization monitoring the human rights environment is the Catholic Commission for Justice and Peace, which has been in existence for nearly 20 years. The Commission has been careful over the years to speak out about all violations, whether they concern whites or blacks, pro- or anti-government persons. It draws its information primarily from the network of Catholic clergy and laymen throughout the country, but it also receives information from persons outside the church. The Commission works carefully within the law. The continuation of security problems and of human rights abuses in Matabeleland has led other church and non-governmental organizations to focus on human rights concerns and to question the Government on them.

Senior government officials in 1983 and in 1984 repeatedly failed to respond to requests from the International Committee of the Red Cross that it be permitted to visit alleged detention camps and at times denied the camps' existence. Similarly, the Government has failed to address requests by private citizens and other locally based non-governmental organizations to investigate a variety of alleged human rights problems.

Amnesty International in its 1984 Report expressed concern about the detentions without trial of alleged political opponents of the Government, and about allegations of torture. Freedom House terms Zimbabwe "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The Government of Zimbabwe has tried to correct the substantial imbalance between black and white standards of living that existed before independence by providing greater opportunities and services to the black population. Whites comprise less than 120,000 of the total population of 8,383,000. Economic and financial constraints have slowed government implementation of a number of programs, notably land resettlement, but the expansion of health care and universal primary education for all Zimbabweans and the reduction in income disparities have proceeded steadily. Gross domestic product per capita was roughly $713 in 1983 (a drop in U.S. dollar terms but a slight rise in local currency).

Health care available to Zimbabwe's population--growing at a rate of 3.3 percent a year--varies widely between urban and rural areas. Despite considerable emigration of skilled medical personnel since independence, hospitals and clinics in the urban areas still provide relatively good service. The rural population is less likely to have easy access to basic medical care, primarily because Zimbabwe still lacks sufficient personnel and infrastructure to reach all areas of a country as large as Montana. The Government's program to expand rural clinics, while it has grown rapidly, is several years short of meeting health needs in all remote areas. The average life expectancy at birth (1984) is 56.54 years, up from 54.41 at independence. The infant mortality rate in 1984 is 102.40 per 1,000 births (up from 87.3 the year before), which probably reflects drought and improvements in the data base, rather than a decline in national health standards for the newborn.

Zimbabwe has traditionally been one of the few countries in sub-Saharan Africa able to feed itself. Indeed, until the major drought, which began in 1982 and has not yet broken, it exported and even donated maize to its less fortunate neighbors. The nutritional balance is skewed in favor of urban dwellers, but barring drought even the rural population has access to an adequate diet. In 1982, the Government instituted an extensive drought-relief program to provide staples to affected rural areas. When the flow of relief supplies to some sections of Matabeleland was interrupted during the curfew of February-April 1984, it was alleged that the Government was using hunger as a weapon to obtain the cooperation and political loyalty of the affected population. The Government has denied any such discrimination and shortly after international attention was drawn to the issue, food deliveries resumed. There were no substantiated reports of deaths as a result of drought relief shortages. It was estimated in 1977 that caloric intake as a percentage of requirements was 107.78 percent for the nation as a whole; no more recent figures are available.

The Government currently estimates that there are more than 2.6 million children in school in Zimbabwe, over 3 times the number at independence in 1980. Because of budgetary constraints and skills shortages, however, the Government has not been able to meet the demand for classrooms and teachers. In addition, the Government has had to abandon its original intention to make all schooling free of charge and some schools, especially at the secondary level, are reinstituting fees. Nonetheless, educational opportunities are greatly increased over preindependence levels. In 1982 it was estimated that 145.66 percent of the children in primary school age group were actually enrolled; this oversized figure represented children whose schooling had been interrupted by the guerrilla war and who had returned to the classrooms when the security situation stabilized. The number has probably dropped somewhat in the past two years. It was estimated that 31.2 percent of the total adult population was illiterate in 1980; since then adult literacy classes have sprung up all over the country and the percentage of illiterates has doubtless been reduced.

Despite efforts to clarify and modernize the situation, the legal status of women in Zimbabwean society remains ambiguous. In 1980 the Government passed the Legal Age of Majority Act which gave all women over the age of 18 equal legal rights, including the right to arrange their own marriages and to own property apart from their husbands. On the other hand, the system of "lobola," or bride price, is still the social norm, and the reality of equal rights remains elusive. A recent ruling by the Supreme Court found that fathers may no longer sue for "seduction damages" from a male suitor who has impregnated a daughter over the age of 18; the woman herself may sue, however. The widespread public reaction against this ruling is indicative of the power of traditional norms in a society whose government seeks equality of the sexes according to contemporary standards.

CENTRAL AND SOUTH AMERICA

ANTIGUA AND BARBUDA

Antigua and Barbuda, which celebrated its third anniversary of independence from the United Kingdom on November 1, 1984, is a member of the British Commonwealth. The observance of human rights practices is both supported by law and reinforced by the democratic political values and traditions that evolved prior to independence.

The Constitution, which came into effect with independence, establishes a parliamentary system of government based on majority rule, and requires general elections at least every five years.

The country's political development has continued along democratic lines. Its population has a literacy rate of 88 percent, supports democratic values and practices, and can express dissent openly, aided by a free press.
Security forces consist of the police and a small infantry unit, the Antigua Defense Force. The police are organized, trained, and managed along British lines. The security forces generally have a good reputation for respecting human rights in law enforcement.

The country is still developing economically, and poverty is widespread despite active development efforts centered on increasing investment. Although the state holds equity in some enterprises, the private sector is strong and individuals are free to pursue private interests and hold private property. However, some political opponents of Prime Minister Vere C. Bird, Sr. complain that their businesses have suffered from government retaliation for their political activities.

In 1984, the state of human rights in this newly independent democracy continued to be good.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

No instances of political killing were reported in 1984.

b. Disappearance

No disappearances, extra-legal detentions or politically-motivated abductions were reported in 1984.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There are constitutional prohibitions against torture and cruel or inhuman treatment of prisoners or detainees. These prohibitions are respected in practice. Prison conditions are adequate, and regular visits by a prisoner's family and attorney as well as by members of the clergy are permitted.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Arbitrary arrest and detention is constitutionally prohibited, and does not occur. The right of habeas corpus is legally guaranteed, and anyone detained must be brought before a court within 48 hours. There have been no reported cases of exile.

ANTIGUA AND BARBUDA

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Accused persons are guaranteed a fair, open, and public trial. The judiciary is independent and is widely respected for its fairness and professionalism. The highly regarded regional West Indies Court of Appeal serves Antigua and Barbuda. Persons without means to retain a private attorney are guaranteed legal assistance at government expense.

There are no political prisoners in Antigua and Barbuda.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Arbitrary police or government actions against a person's home, family, or privacy have not been reported. A warrant must be obtained prior to the initiation of any search of private premises. There have been charges of mail tampering from left-wing elements, but no evidence has been produced and no cases brought to court.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution guarantees freedom of speech, press, and other forms of communication. However, the electronic media, which are the only source of daily local news, are dominated by the Government (ABS radio and ABS-TV are state-owned, and the only privately-owned station, ZDK radio, is controlled by the Prime Minister's family). Opposition politicians have complained that they have almost no access to air time for the presentation of their positions. The situation is different in the print media. Weekly newspapers representing the opposition can and do publish a variety of opinions and attacks on the Government. Religious organizations also publish their own newspapers.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution assures the right of peaceful assembly. Peaceful public meetings and organized demonstrations are held without police interference. Probably less than a majority of workers belong to unions, but labor organizations are free to organize and bargain on behalf of members. The right to strike can be limited depending on the involvement of the industrial court in a given dispute. Unions are free to affiliate with international labor bodies.

c. Freedom of Religion

The free exercise of religious beliefs is fundamental in Antiguan life. While the population is overwhelmingly Protestant, adherents to other religious denominations proselytize openly without stigma or government interference.

Some foreign members of the Bahai faith in previous years have claimed they have been warned to refrain from involvement in politics and to limit their evangelical activities, or risk the revocation of work permits and residency status. The evidence indicated that this harassment probably resulted from the prejudices of individual officials involved. The Ministry of Legal Affairs and the Office of the Attorney General have been monitoring the situation, and no complaints were received in 1984.

Members of the small Rastafarian cult have in the past complained of harassment, resulting in part from their reputation for using, cultivating, and selling marijuana, and most of those subjected to police searches for drug dealers and smugglers have been Rastafarians. However, there were no reports of such problems in 1984.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no restrictions on the movement of citizens within Antigua and Barbuda. Travel outside the country is generally unrestricted, although a few political opponents of the Bird Government have had their passports confiscated to ensure their attendance at legal proceedings which they claimed were politically motivated.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Antigua and Barbuda has a multiparty political system which accommodates widely divergent views. All citizens 18 years of age and older may vote if registered. Individual parties conduct voter registration drives free from government interference. The Government is obligated by law to hold voter registration during a fixed period each year.

Early elections held in April 1984 (they were not required until the following April) gave the present government an overwhelming victory. The Antigua Labor Party won every constituency in Antigua. In Barbuda, the sole seat was won by an independent, who thus became the Government's only parliamentary opposition. However, there are no allegations that the elections were other than fair and open.

One of Prime Minister Bird's sons is Minister of External Affairs, Economic Development, Tourism, and Energy; another is Minister of Public Utilities and Communications. The opposition energetically attacks the Bird government, in particular over the issue of alleged corruption. Separatist feeling in the smaller island of Barbuda (with an estimated 1,200 of the country's entire population of 81,000) remains a problem with which the Government must deal.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Internationally recognized human rights organizations have not expressed particular interest in Antigua and Barbuda; there have been no requests for investigations or inquiries into alleged violations. The Government is sensitive to human rights issues, and it has joined international condemnation of human rights abuses elsewhere, especially those in South Africa and Central America.

Amnesty International did not mention Antigua and Barbuda in its 1984 report. Freedom House describes the country as "free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Tourism dominates the Antiguan economy. Latest figures indicate that half of the country's gross domestic product (GDP) is derived directly or indirectly from tourism. The per capita GDP was estimated at $1,537.60 for 1982. There has been little growth in the economy over the past two years.

The decline of agriculture after 1967, when Antigua and Barbuda became semi-autonomous, caused the countryside to lose its population to the city. With agriculture now accounting for less than 15 percent of the GDP, the Government is promoting a "back to the land" movement, providing financial incentives to young men and women willing to work in the agricultural sector.

Manufacturing accounts for another 15 percent of GDP, but recent economic decisions by other Caribbean Community members have limited growth in this sector. Factory closings and bankruptcies have led to increased unemployment and government budgetary shortfalls, as tax revenues from manufacturing dry up. Efforts to attract foreign investors continue, but the primary problem remains the identification of potential foreign markets for domestically manufactured goods.

The Government has continued its capital development program for education and health. Adult literacy approaches 90 percent, and enrollment of eligible children in primary schools has risen to 85 percent since 1981. The Government has earmarked funds to upgrade secondary and higher education. Infant mortality has dropped to 27.3 per thousand live births, and annual population growth is 1.3 percent.

There are no legal restrictions on the role of women. The traditional perception of the role of women, particularly in rural areas, confines them to home and family, but this is changing. The Government has instituted programs, including the enhancement of educational opportunities for both sexes and family planning, which are expected to lead to further opportunities for women.

Currently, the Government of Antigua and Barbuda has two female senators, (an increase of one following the April 1984 elections), the highest ranking female political figures in the country. The Permanent Secretary in the Ministry of Health and the Chief Establishment Officer [equivalent to a director of personnel for the entire government] are both women. A woman also heads the Department of Tourism. There is a "woman's desk" in the Government to monitor complicance with the laws and statutes regarding women and to safeguard their legal rights. Ninety percent of the Assistant Permanent Secretaries in the Government are women. Six out of ten personnel in the Civil Service of Antigua are women. Women receive equal pay for equal work by law.

ARGENTINA

In 1984 Argentina continued to consolidate the dramatic improvements in its human rights situation stemming from the successful 1983 transition of a military government to a freely-elected civilian government. Argentina is once again a constitutional democracy with an executive branch, an independent bicameral legislature, and an autonomous judicial system. Political debate was free and open, and all parties had access to the media. There was a high level of public participation in discussing the issues of the day.

Full respect for civil rights returned to Argentina in 1984. Press restrictions ended and controls on the largely government-owned electronic media were the least restrictive since the 1976 military coup. Freely-elected national and provincial legislatures reopened. An independent judiciary functioned normally by the end of 1984. Trade union freedom was greater than at any time since 1976; strikes occurred, including one national strike on September 3, and most unions completed leadership elections by the end of the year.

There were also improvements in respect for individual rights and, for the fourth year in a row, there were no disappearances. Human rights groups continued to demand a complete accounting for past disappearances and punishment for those responsible. President Raul Alfonsin appointed the National Commission on the Disappearance of Persons, which completed its report in September. He also created a special, permanent human rights office in the Ministry of the Interior to continue the work of the commission. Among other steps to institutionalize human rights were new laws strengthening the right of habeas corpus and making torture a crime, signing and ratifying the Inter-American Human Rights Convention, and supporting the United Nations Convention on Torture. The provincial government in La Rioja began mandatory human rights courses at all schools and for all provincial policemen.

During 1984 Argentina continued to be beset by a number of severe economic problems, including a 688 percent annual rate of inflation and foreign debt-servicing difficulties. The Government has taken steps to address those problems, including the negotiation of an agreement with the IMF. Argentina's population of 30.2 million had a per capita gross national product of $2,520 in 1982.

There were very few human rights problems in Argentina during 1984. These arose largely from the problem of how to deal with trying and punishing those responsible for the abuses of the late 1970's.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There is no outstanding charge by human rights groups of any death occurring during 1984 that was politically motivated or instigated by the Government. At the end of December, one Argentine press report noted that 1984 was the first year since 1968 in which no political killings occured in Argentina.

b. Disappearance

In 1984, for the fourth consecutive year, there was no evidence of disappearances. Accounting for the large number of persons who disappeared between 1973 and 1980 and punishing those responsible continued to be major issues, however, and courts continued to investigate cases of unmarked graves. Some exhumed corpses were identified as individuals who had disappeared. President Alfonsin declared at a year-end press conference that his Government had not found any disappeared persons alive. Some human rights groups have documented cases of children of disappeared parents being raised by adoptive parents, in some cases former security officers. In at least one case, a child has been reunited with its grandparents.

On December 15, 1983, just five days after his inauguration, President Alfonsin ordered the creation of a National Commission on the Disappearance of Persons to help clarify what happened to the people who disappeared. The commission's tasks included: receiving charges and evidence concerning cases of people who disappeared for submission to the courts; investigating the whereabouts of missing persons; establishing the whereabouts of missing children; and denouncing in the courts any attempts to conceal, steal, or destroy evidence related to disappearances. The commission, which gave its report to President Alfonsin on September 20, also compiled a carefully documented list of missing persons containing 8,961 names. The President promised to submit the findings to the courts, which will decide if there is sufficient evidence for trials to be held. Punishing those responsible for disappearances is a controversial issue in Argentina. Human rights groups charge that a number of bombings and other violent attempts to obstruct justice occured in 1984. Alfonsin also created a special, permanent office in the Ministry of the Interior to replace the commission and to continue its work. That office will also receive any future reports of rights violations, file court cases, enforce human rights laws, produce new draft human rights legislation, and launch relevant education and information campaigns about human rights.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution prohibits the use of torture. In at least two cases, judges sentenced police officials to prison terms of at least three years for having tortured prisoners in years prior to 1984. In one of those cases, a judge also sentenced police medical officers to two years in prison for covering up torture and for producing falsified reports. Some allegations of torture by police officials, mostly of beatings, were made in 1984. During 1984 judges increased their efforts to curb the use of torture. For example, a judge in Cordoba city made an unexpected visit to that city's sixth provincial police precinct, interviewed prisoners individually, and found six prisoners who claimed to have been tortured in April. The judge then had twelve provincial policemen, including the precinct chief, detained and indicted for torture.

Incidents of violence by unknown assailants, generally believed to be non-governmental, occurred during 1984 and became more numerous in the last quarter of the year. Some appeared to be related to the political or labor activities of the people involved. For example, in October a Buenos Aires neighborhood Peronist party council member was kidnapped at gunpoint, allegedly tortured for four hours (with cigarette burns and beatings), and interrogated about the activities of Peronist party leaders. The Government is investigating the attack.

In December 1983, President Alfonsin submitted a proposal to Congress to make torture a crime, liable to the same punishment as murder, i.e., life imprisonment, and in 1984 Congress approved a criminal code reform punishing torture with the same penalties applied for homicide. Torture (where no death resulted) can now be punished by prison sentences ranging from eight to 25 years, plus permanent exclusion from public office; life imprisonment is an automatic punishment in all cases where the victim was tortured to death.

The Alfonsin Administration appointed a new Director of the National Prison Service who immediately instituted reforms designed to improve prison conditions. Moreover, Argentine senators and congressmen visited prisons and pushed for improved conditions and reforms, with success. Prisoners and their relatives told the press that prison conditions improved after the civilian Government took office. Journalists were allowed to interview prisoners and to visit inside the prisons, a practice that had not been in effect previously. Despite the improved conditions, there were protests, hunger strikes, and riots in some of the prisons during 1984, and three prisoners committed suicide, one supposedly because his request for release had been denied. The prison protests resulted from prisoners' demands for better food and work conditions and a reduction in their sentences. In June, hundreds of prisoners at Caseros Prison in Buenos Aires, infuriated by the news that one of their fellow inmates had died following an operation in the prison hospital, created one of the worst riots in the annals of Argentine penal history.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Argentina has a well-developed legal code containing provisions such as habeas corpus and controls on police arrest and investigatory powers. In 1984 Congress passed a law that strengthened the right of habeas corpus by giving judges greater authority. The Argentine penal code, however, gives the police and courts authority to detain persons incommunicado for up to eight days. Even in the case of minor offenses, holding of suspects incommunicado for a few days is common. The Constitution also confers power on the executive branch to detain persons indefinitely under a State of Siege, which was lifted on October 29, 1983.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

For the judiciary, 1984 was a year of transition. By the end of the year it was functioning normally after having overcome such problems as slow Senate approval of judges. The major backlogs in cases now being handled continue to be a serious problem.

At the beginning of 1984, some Argentine human rights groups claimed there were still 147 so-called political prisoners in Argentina. The Government disagreed and said those prisoners had been convicted of crimes by either civil or military courts and the Government could not summarily overturn those verdicts. Instead, the Government suggested that the prisoners request a judicial review of their cases. Many prisoners did, and some of these were released during 1984.

In July, a law took effect shortening the sentences of prisoners who were sentenced between March 24, 1976, and December 10, 1983 (the period of military rule). By December the number used by human rights groups had dropped from 147 to 15, most of whom had been convicted of violent crimes under a civilian, constitutional government before the 1976 military takeover. President Alfonsin stated in December that "There are no political prisoners. . . but criminal prisoners with political connotations."

The Argentine penal code provides for open trials, and all rulings by lower courts, civilian and military, may be appealed to the Supreme Court. In its first decision since being appointed by President Alfonsin, the new five-member Supreme Court in January ruled unconstitutional the trial of civilians by military tribunals. The court simultaneously annuled a prison sentence given by the Supreme Council of the Armed Forces to an alleged terrorist, and in May quashed the prison sentence given to a conscript soldier in 1974.

President Alfonsin, in December 1983, ordered the Armed Forces Supreme Council to try the nine leaders of the military governments in power from 1976-82 for homicide, illegal imprisonment, and torture of prisoners. However, numerous human rights cases against military personnel were pressed in civilian courts, which sometimes only relinquished jurisdiction after considerable publicity and, on occasion, appeal to higher courts. Human rights leaders wanted civilian judges to try military personnel charged with human rights abuses. In June the Supreme Court overruled lower courts and ordered the trial of former President and retired army Major General Reynaldo Bignone by the Armed Forces Supreme Council in the case of three conscripts who disappeared in 1976. That Supreme Court decision confirmed the constitutionality of the amendment to the code of military justice passed by Congress earlier in 1984, which provided for military trials of all military and security personnel involved in crimes related to the suppression of subversion prior to mid-1982, subject to final appeal in civil appellate courts. Nevertheless, when the Armed Forces Supreme Council did not complete the trials of the junta members by October, a civil appellate court decided to take over the trials, based on a suit brought before the court by civilians. The appellate court, however, took over only the cases against the junta members, and left all other trials involving alleged human rights violations by military and security personnel to the Supreme Council of the Armed Forces.

In late December, the Supreme Court ruled against an appeal by the Junta members and upheld civil jurisdiction of the cases. The Supreme Council of the Armed Forces resigned en masse in November, at least partially to protest the Ministry of Defense's alleged failure to defend the Council from the criticism which followed its announcement that it could not complete the junta members' trials by the assigned deadline. However, the Council continued to function throughout December, pending government action on the resignations and possible replacements.

President Alfonsin also ordered in December 1983 that legal action be taken against seven terrorist leaders for their crimes during 1976-1982. Mario Firmenich, allegedly a leader of the Montonero terrorists, was extradited to Argentina by Brazil in October of 1984 to be tried on several charges, including double homicide. Ricardo Obregon Cano, former Governor of Cordoba Province, was arrested and charged with illegal association (with the Montoneros).

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence.

There were few reported cases of arbitrary intrusion by the state into the private life of individuals in Argentina in 1984. In September, however, a federal judge ordered Congress to return documents confiscated by a lower house investigative committee from the law offices of a former government official. The judge, responding to a complaint filed by the former official, said that he did not question the committee's investigative powers but ruled that the committee was not empowered to confiscate private documents in private homes and offices without a judicial warrant. The Buenos Aires Bar Association and some congressmen criticized these unauthorized searches and impounding of documents. Other congressmen insisted on Congress' right to carry out such actions and the judge's ruling was appealed. The appellate court upheld the judges ruling, but the Congressional committee will carry its appeal to the Supreme Court, which will make the final decision.

The Federal Criminal Court of Appeals acquitted a woman in August who had been charged with illegal possession of weapons, declaring illegal the police raid on her home during which the weapons were found. The court said the police had trespassed and should have obtained a judicial warrant first.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

There were very few restrictions on freedom of speech and press in Argentina during 1984. Criticism of the Government is tolerated and opposition viewpoints are freely expressed. Congress, however, did have two people arrested and detained for several days for having made derogatory remarks about Congress and some of its members. An independent press offers views that cover the entire political spectrum, and an independent judiciary and a functioning democratic political system work to insure freedom of speech and press.

Some human rights leaders claimed that the Government would not let them appear on government-owned television; the Government denied the charge.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Since August 1982, all groups and parties, except subversive organizations outlawed for espousing violence, have been free to organize and assemble. Major rallies were held by political parties, including the Communist Party, during 1984.

The labor movement is once again a major independent political and economic force. The new Government moved to restore organized labor's full rights, and there was extensive debate and action on trade union legislation in Congress. However, the impact of the prolonged suspension of normal trade union activity under the previous military Government has complicated the process. For example, most trade unions have not been able to hold elections in ten years, and the incumbent leadership has been extended in office. To revalidate the authority of leadership at all levels of organized labor, elections are being held under legislation reflecting considerable input from labor itself. This process should be completed early in 1985. In the meantime, the de facto leadership of organized labor does speak to management and the Government on worker-related issues. Unions strike to support their demands. Wage settlements are generally decided by the Government, often after consultation with labor and management. In addition, the Government opened formal talks with labor and sectors of the business community on a social pact covering policies to be followed to meet the grave economic crisis facing the country.

The previous military Government intervened in the affairs of many unions and their social welfare organizations and suspended collective bargaining. Some traces of those restrictions remain and will continue until the union election process is completed. Some unions still have officials appointed by the military Government who are continuing to work in a temporary capacity to assist the election process and transition to the newly-elected leaders. Many trade union social welfare organizations are still intervened with. In this case, the Government plans legislation redefining their operations and is pledged to discuss this legislation with organized labor.

On September 29, 1984, Congress passed a law revoking the decree of the military Government that suspended collective bargaining. The law provides that normal collective bargaining procedures be fully restored within one year.

Unions are free to maintain ties with international labor organizations as they see fit; they participated in international labor conferences during 1984. At the annual International Labor Organization conference in June, Argentina was singled out for praise because of the return to democracy and the progress made in improving trade union freedoms.

c. Freedom of Religion

Argentina's Constitution states that everyone has the right to practice his religion, but it also states the Federal Government supports Roman Catholicism. The Constitution also requires the President and Vice President to be members of the Roman Catholic Church. Religions other than Catholicism must register with the Government to obtain the legal recognition required to operate freely in Argentina. In July the Government granted long-pending legal recognition to the Jehovah's Witnesses. About 300 Witnesses, all Argentine nationals, remain prisoners for refusal to accept compulsory military service. The usual penalty is three and one-half years of civilian service at military installations. Conditions are not onerous and the prisoners are given furloughs for as much as a month at a time. Judges have ruled that the punishment was excessive and ordered Witnesses released in a few individual cases in 1984. In December 1984 the Alfonsin Government submitted to Congress legislation which would permit alternative service, probably lasting longer than conscripts' one year of military service, for conscientious objectors opposed to military service on moral or religious grounds.

Argentina's Jewish community (about 250,000) practices its religion without restraint. Although occasional anti-semitic incidents occur, there were fewer such incidents in 1984 than in 1983. Recent military and civilian governments have publicly condemned religious prejudice. In September, the executive branch submitted to Congress a draft bill condemning racial, religious, and other forms of discrimination. Congress did not act on the bill by the end of the year. Missionaries are permitted to enter Argentina and to proselytize. The non-Catholic population is growing.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Internal and foreign travel and emigration are basically unrestricted. Several thousand former exiles returned to Argentina during 1984, many as a result of the Government's policy of encouraging such people to return, and about 3,000 returned with financial assistance from the United Nations High Commission for Refugees (UNHCR). In June, the Government created a national commission to facilitate the return of Argentines abroad. Also, the Executive Branch issued a decree in April that reestablished the citizenship of all Argentines who were deprived of their Argentine nationality by the previous military Government. In September, Congress amended Argentina's law concerning refugees to extend the status of refugee to any exiled foreigner seeking asylum in Argentina. Previously, only people of European origin could obtain refugee status. President Alfonsin signed the bill into law. The change is expected to benefit thousands of people, and will allow the UNHCR to provide more help to non-European refugees than in the past.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

In October 1983 the President, Vice President, two senators, all 254 deputies of the lower house of the legislature, provincial governors and legislators, and mayors and municipal councils were elected directly in free and democratic elections. Another 44 national senators were elected by provincial legislatures in November 1983. Elections for one-half the national deputies in the lower house and for a proportion of the members of each provincial legislature will be held in 1985.

Thirteen political parties covering the political spectrum, including the Communist Party, qualified as national parties and presented candidates. Other parties qualified in individual provinces. There is a large, politically important, active opposition that operates openly.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Argentina cooperates with both the UN Human Rights Commission and the Organization of American States Inter-American Human Rights Commission (IAHRC). The Executive Secretary of the IAHRC visited Argentina in March and praised the new Government's work in the human rights field. In October, the IAHRC's annual report praised President Alfonsin for his dedication to strengthening the rule of law and consolidating a democratic system in Argentina. The Inter-American Human Rights Court convened in Argentina in October, its first session ever outside its seat in San Jose, Costa Rica.

In 1984 Argentina signed and ratified the Inter-American Human Rights Convention. Congress' lower house also approved the UN Convention on Civil and Political Rights and the UN Convention on Economic, Social, and Cultural Rights in February. The Senate was studying those conventions when it adjourned its ordinary session in October. The civilian Government also reversed its military predecessor's position on the draft UN Convention on Torture and supported the draft, the first time an Argentine Government had done so. The new Argentine position resulted in the completion, after six years, of the draft for presentation to the UN General Assembly which subsequently approved it.

Two new private human rights organizations, the Association of Former Detained and Disappeared Persons and the Office of Solidarity for Argentine Exiles, were established in 1984, bringing to 11 the total of these groups in Argentina. Human rights organizations operated freely in 1984 despite some harassment from unknown sources. Various human rights activists reported receiving anonymous death threats. The homes of two and the office of a third were bombed. Nevertheless, human rights groups stepped up their activities and expanded their efforts in 1984, primarily by bringing cases to court either to account for the "disappeared" or to seek punishment of those alleged to be responsible for the disappearances. They also urged that human rights instruction be included in school curricula. The active role of the Mothers' of the Plaza de Mayo in organizing demonstrations against the Government policy of trials initially by military courts prompted President Alfonsin to state that the group has political objectives which do not coincide with Argentine national interest.

Amnesty International's 1984 report, covering 1983, stated that after a civilian Government took office in Argentina in December 1983, official efforts got under way to trace the fate of thousands who had "disappeared" in earlier years, and that by the end of 1983 more than 200 prisoners of conscience, some of whom had been detained without trial for seven years, had been released following the lifting of the State of Siege. Freedom House rates Argentina "free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Notwithstanding 688% inflation in consumer prices during 1984, with 28 percent of the people living below a government-defined poverty level and the continued existence of a few pockets of abject poverty, most of Argentina's population of 30.2 million continued to enjoy a relatively good standard of living.

The rate of unemployment and underemployment fell during the first half of 1984 to a combined level of 9 percent. At the end of 1984 the Government introduced a system of unemployment compensation for up to six months (in some cases nine). Real wages increased for lower-income groups in 1984, while they decreased for middle-and high-income groups. The population growth rate in 1984 was 1.6 percent.

ARGENTINA

Women in Argentina are active in government, the professions, politics, and private voluntary organizations, but they have to contend with a variety of discriminatory mechanisms that are rooted in cultural, economic, and social structures. For example, married women living in Argentina must have the permission of their husbands to travel abroad with their minor children if the husband is not accompanying them, although new legislation submitted by the administration in December 1984 would require permission of both parents for minor children to travel abroad. The same proposed legislation would give equal inheritance rights to legitimate and illegitimate children. There is no divorce in Argentina. There is no official policy of discrimination, however, and the Alfonsin Administration addressed the issue in its first year in office. In March, a government ministry (Health and Social Action) organized a three-day forum to commemorate International Women's Day. President Alfonsin closed the forum by stating that sex discrimination would be banned by law and a draft bill was submitted to Congress in September. The Government also paid homage to women on March 8 (International Women's Day) for the part they played in restoring democracy in Argentina. In July, Congress' lower house approved the UN Convention for the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women. The Senate was studying the convention when it adjourned its ordinary session in October.

Women participate freely in politics in Argentina. There were scores of women candidates in 1983 for the National Congress (ten won: three senators and seven deputies), several women candidates for governor (none won) and vice governor of provinces (one won), and three women candidates for vice president (none won).

In the largely middle-class Argentine society, 80 percent of the population lives in urban areas, and at least 65 percent own their homes (the same percentage as in the U.S.). The average Argentine enjoys a healthy, high-protein diet which provided 126 percent of the daily caloric requirement in 1977. Sixty-six percent of the population had access to safe water (1975). In 1984, life expectancy at birth was 70.6 years, and the infant mortality rate was 34.9 per 1000 live births.

The adult literacy rate in 1971 was 93 percent for males and 92 percent for females. The adjusted primary school enrollment ratio was 134 percent in 1982 (Male: 134; Female 133). In the Province of Buenos Aires, where approximately one-third of the nation's population resides, 93.6 percent of the 12-year old population was attending school at the time of the 1980 census, 1.7 percent had already graduated, and less than one percent had never attended.

THE BAHAMAS

The Bahamas is a multiparty, parliamentary democracy with regular national elections. As a Commonwealth country, its political and legal traditions are similar to those of Great Britain, with emphasis on the rights of individuals. The Progressive Liberal Party has governed since 1967 under the same leader, Sir Lynden Pindling.

The country has a tradition of human rights observance. The Constitution provides for the protection of fundamental rights and freedoms without discrimination by reason of race, origin, political opinions, color, creed, or sex, and its provisions are carried out in practice. The judiciary is independent, and the Privy Council in The United Kingdom serves as the court of final appeal. No major changes occurred in the human rights record during 1984.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There have been no killings for political motives during recent years. There are no known terrorist groups in the country.

b. Disappearance

There have been no cases of abduction, secret arrests, or clandestine detention.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture and cruel or degrading treatment or punishment are prohibited by the Constitution. Both American citizens as well as Bahamians have on occasion reported instances of police brutality during the course of arrests or in obtaining confessions to crimes. Redress is possible through the courts, but it is rarely sought.

The downtown Nassau jail is crowded and unsanitary, with food barely adequate; conditions at the Fox Hill prison are austere and overcrowded but somewhat better. The Freeport central lockup is unsanitary.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution prohibits arbitrary arrest and imprisonment and requires that persons be charged without undue delay. This is observed in practice. Habeas corpus is respected, charges must be brought within 24 hours of an arrest, and those arrested are allowed access to lawyers of their own choosing.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Trials are fair and public. The Constitution entitles defendants to counsel, and access to defendants is freely permitted. The judiciary is independent of executive or military control, and there is no political interference in its activities. There are no political prisoners.

THE BAHAMAS

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home or Correspondence

The Government does not interfere in the private lives of its citizens. The sanctity of the home is safeguarded by custom, law, and tradition and is respected in practice. The Constitution permits searches to occur only with a court-issued warrant. Personal privacy is respected, and there are no known cases of wiretapping or interception of correspondence.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Full freedom of speech and press exist in the Bahamas. There are three privately owned daily newspapers, one publicly owned radio station with three frequencies, and one publicly owned television station. There are several news weeklies, of which three are affiliated with political parties, including one affiliated with the leftist Vanguard Party. The television station is government-owned and has been accused by the opposition Free National Movement of political reporting biased in favor of the ruling party. There is no political censorship or intimidation of journalists. For example, in 1984, the local press published details of a commission of inquiry, investigating charges of official corruption, which were politically embarrassing to the Government. U.S. newspapers and magazines carrying such stories enter and circulate freely.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution protects the right to assemble freely and associate with others and specifically mentions political parties and trade unions. Labor unions are independent of the Government and are free to organize, assemble, bargain, and strike. Many unions are affiliated with counterparts in other countries and in the International Labor Organization. The Secretary General of the Commonwealth of the Bahamas Trade Union Congress, an umbrella organization comprising most of the leading trade unions, also serves as President of the Caribbean Congress of Labor.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is no state religion, freedom of conscience is protected, and discrimination on the basis of creed is prohibited. Some members of the small Rastafarian cult believe they are persecuted by the police, but the police assert that their actions have been directed against some illegal Rastafarian practices, such as drug use.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigraton, and Repatriation

There exists freedom of movement within and outside the country. However, an estimated 12,000-20,000 Haitians who left Haiti mainly for economic reasons now reside illegally in the Bahamas and have no legal status; during 1984 approximately 250 who had been incarcerated were repatriated to Haiti. The Bahamas continues to be concerned about the arrival of illegal aliens, principally Haitians, and insists upon its sovereign right to repatriate them to their country of origin. This problem appears to be economically rather than politically based.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The Bahamas is a constitutional democracy governed by a freely elected Prime Minister and Parliament, with a resident Governor General under the British Commonwealth system. The political process is open to all elements of the society. There are two principal political parties, the governing and dominant Progressive Liberal Party and the opposition Free National Movement.

The Progressive Liberal Party led the country for five years of internal self-government before independence in 1973, and has held power without interruption since that time. It currently holds 32 of the 43 seats in Parliament. The Free National Movement, a more conservative party, holds the other 11 seats. The radical leftist party, the Vanguard, has no seats.

The last general election was in 1982 and new elections need not take place before 1987. Elections can be called sooner, however.

The Progressive Liberal Party has used its tenure in office to strengthen its political position through selective political appointments and by hiring political supporters as civil servants, which has drawn increasing opposition criticism.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

There have been no requests from international organizations to investigate human rights conditions in the Bahamas. The Government has not generally been active in human rights affairs but it has criticized human rights violations in South Africa. Amnesty International did not mention the Bahamas in its 1984 report. Freedom House rated the country "free" but noted that government power is partly maintained "by discrimination in favor of supporters and control over the broadcast media."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The Bahamas is made up of some 700 islands or cays; only 10 have populations of any size. Of these, two islands, New Providence (Nassau) and Grand Bahama, contain over 75 percent of the population. Most economic and cultural activities take place on these two islands. The Government has sought to develop the other, "family" islands to curb the movement by young people to the two major centers of activity.

The Bahamas has a good record of nondiscrimination on sexual, racial, and religious grounds. Notwithstanding the transfer of political power from the colonial era's white elite to a black majority (80 percent) in the 1960's, a few white Bahamians hold high-level civil service and political posts, and a few are in Parliament. Women participate prominently in all levels of business and government. In both law and practice women enjoy equal status. Women serve as Permanent Secretaries in ministries (the highest civil service position), one was elected to a seat in Parliament, and four have been appointed to the Senate. Women are well represented in the professional and private sectors. Many businesses are owned by women. Several magistrates are female, and women serve as uniformed police officers.

The current population is 228,000. Life expectancy at birth is 70.07 years, while infant mortality is 20.20 per 1,000 births. The annual population growth rate is 2 percent. The Bahamas has 925 hospital beds, and Ministry of Health doctors make regular trips to the outer islands. 1979 statistics indicate that 65 percent of the total population had access to safe water. The urban percentage was 100 percent, while the rural percentage was just 13 percent.

In education, the Government is continuing to place emphasis on technical and vocational training. While literacy rates have remained about 93 percent over the past decade, with a 1980 primary school enrollment ratio of 97.31 percent, a weakening of education in the public school system has resulted from shortages of teachers, equipment, and supplies as well as physical deterioration of many schools. There are 225 schools in the Bahamas of which 62 are private.

Per capita gross national product was estimated at $3,831 for 1982. The rate of inflation from August 1983 to September 1984 was estimated by the Department of Statistics at 3.90 percent, while the overall unemployment figure for 1979 was 19.6 percent (for those between 14 and 19 it is estimated at 42.1 percent, and 22.7 percent for those between 20 and 24). The Government is continuing to attempt to reduce unemployment by creating new jobs in tourism through both private and public investment.

Drug abuse is a growing problem, especially among the younger generation affected by high unemployment. Primarily the result of spillover from the drug traffic in transit to the U.S., the ready availability of high-grade cocaine has led to a high level of addiction. Several privately sponsored programs are attempting to address the problem, while the Government is reviewing the recommendations of a special task force called to study the situation.

BARBADOS

Barbados, a member of the British Commonwealth, is a constitutional democracy. Its House of Assembly is the third oldest elected body in the Western Hemisphere. It enjoys a free, two-party democratic system of the government modeled on the British System. The Prime Minister is the Head of Government.

The Royal Barbados Police Force insures public order; it respects the constitutional and legal guarantees of human rights. The quality of its personnel and training has improved in recent years, and morale is good. A well-established legal system modeled after the British system provides due process and other legal safeguards.

In 1984, per capita GNP in Barbados was $2,900. The mainstays of the economy are light manufacturing, tourism, services, and sugar.

In 1984, there were no changes in Barbados' excellent human rights situation.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Unlawful or Arbitrary Deprivation of Life

No killings for political motives have been reported in Barbados.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of disappearances in 1984.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture is specifically prohibited by the Constitution, and there have been no reports that it is practiced, nor have there been reports of cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment. Prison conditions are humane, although some overcrowding has been reported as a result of an increase in prison population, due principally to drug related crimes. Prison facilities are being expanded.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution prohibits arbitrary arrest and imprisonment, and this prohibition is respected in practice. The right of habeas corpus is guaranteed and observed; an individual must be taken before a court of law within 72 hours of arrest. Attorneys have ready access to their clients.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution provides that anyone charged with a criminal offense be given a fair, public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial court. This is the practice, and defendants are presumed innocent until proven guilty. The Government provides free legal aid to the indigent. The judiciary acts independently and is free of intervention from other branches of government. There are no political prisoners.

f. Arbitrary Interference With Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Government of Barbados does not interfere arbitrarily in the private lives of its citizens. The Constitution prohibits arbitrary search or entry, which is respected in practice. Warrants are required for entry and search of privately owned property. There is no censorship of mail or restrictions on the receipt of foreign publications.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution guarantees freedom of speech and press, and these freedoms are respected in practice. Newspapers and radio stations function independently of the Government. The Caribbean Broadcasting Corporation Radio and Television Service, modeled after the British Broadcasting Corporation, is government-owned but is independent of government control. Opposition views are regularly reported.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The constitutional guarantees of peaceful assembly and private organization are observed. Various trade associations and private organizations function without government hindrance. Fifty percent of the labor force is organized. Protests or strikes have occurred when collective bargaining has failed. Although one major union has some ties to the opposition party, labor leaders and the rank-and-file are motivated primarily by economic and social, not political, considerations.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is full freedom of religion. While the Anglican and the Methodist faiths are predominate, there is a wide variety of religious organizations active in the country.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Citizens and legal residents move freely within and outside Barbados; the Constitution guarantees the right to do so. In replying to public criticism of some cricket players touring South Africa, the Government stated that it had no power to restrict such travel. Barbados has a small number of applicants for refuge and asylum admission who are handled on a case-by-case basis. Barbados is a party to the 1972 Convention on the Status of Stateless Persons.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Barbados is a parliamentary democracy, following the British model, in which parties compete freely in honest elections held at least once every five years. There are no impediments to participation in the political process. There is universal suffrage, the minimum voting age being 18 years.

The present government under the Barbados Labor Party came into office in 1976 and was reelected in June 1981 with 17 of the 27 assembly seats. The differences between the government party and the opposition Democratic Labor Party are based more on history and personalities than on ideology. Both parties tend toward democratic socialist policies, and they have assumed office in turn during three decades of self-rule. The "loyal opposition" criticizes the Government in generally constructive fashion and presumably would not hesitate to call attention to human rights abuses. There are no third parties at present, although there exists a miniscule but vocal leftist fringe group.

A by-election on July 19, 1984, necessitated by the resignation for health reasons of a member of the ruling party, resulted in a one vote victory for the opposition party. The Barbados Labor Party appealed the results of the election to the courts, which voided the election on the basis of irregularities by election officials with respect to several ballots, which, if counted, would have changed the results.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

There have been no reports of human rights violations in Barbados and human rights groups have not requested investigations. Barbados advocates strengthening the human rights machinery of the United Nations and the Organization of American States. The Government favors more investigations into alleged violations of human rights in other countries and the increased use of fact-finding or observer teams to monitor controversial political and electoral situations. The Government has spoken out on human rights violations in other countries, particularly in the Western Hemisphere and Africa. There are several small groups fostering consciousness of human rights.

Barbados is not covered in the Amnesty International Report for 1984. Freedom House gives Barbados a rating of "free" in both political rights and civil liberties.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Barbados has a population of 252,000 with growth rate of only .3 percent due to continued emigration and a declining birth rate. The economy of Barbados, which until 1980 had enjoyed several years of solid growth, continues to show signs of weakness. The economic recovery that might have been expected to ensue from the upturn in the United States economy has not materialized.

Citizens have long had access to public and private educational systems, and the adult literacy rate is 99 percent. Primary school enrollment is compulsory. Looking ahead to future educational needs, the Government has begun expanding the secondary school system.

Adequate medical care is available to all residents through local clinics and hospitals under the Government's health program. There is one doctor for every 1,500 people. Average life expectancy for Barbadians is 71.95 years. Infant mortality is 20 per thousand live births. Government health insurance programs cover all Barbadians. Overall, Barbadians are well-fed.

BARBADOS

There is no discrimination based on race or sex. Barbados is a signatory to the 1979 Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women. Women actively participate in all aspects of national life. One Cabinet member is a woman, and women are well represented at all levels in both the public and private sectors. Women's groups speak out on public issues and insist on being consulted by the Government on important issues.

BELIZE

Belize achieved independence on September 21, 1981, following seventeen years as an internally self-governing British colony. Belize has a parliamentary form of government with a competitive political party system and regular local and national elections. The People's United Party (PUP) was the dominant political force since it emerged to lead the movement for self-government and independence in the early 1950's. It controlled the national government from the time of internal self-government in 1964 until the first post-independence national elections in December 1984. In the December 14, 1984 national parliamentary election, however, the United Democratic Party (UDP) defeated the PUP, winning 54 percent of the popular vote and capturing 21 of the 28 seats in the House of Representatives. The election was peaceful, open, and honest. In addition, the UDP currently controls four of the eight municipal councils in Belize, including the Belize City Council.

The security apparatus consists of the Belize National Police and the Belize Defense Force (BDF). The National Police comprises approximately 600 men and women and has the principal responsibility for law enforcement and maintenance of order. The BDF consists of 800 active personnel and reservists, with both men and women serving. Although internal security is not the principal mission of the BDF, it occasionally assists in police activities. During 1984, BDF personnel conducted a number of joint operations with police to destroy marijuana fields and seize marijuana processing equipment.

The economy returned to positive growth in 1983-84, registering an increase in the GDP of one to two percent, but continues to suffer the effects of low world prices for sugar, which accounts for approximately 50 percent of Belize's foreign exchange earnings, and from the sharp reduction in the re-export trade to Mexico caused by the decline of the Mexican peso. Public sector finances came under substantial pressure in 1983-84 mainly due to declining revenues from the slack economy. The Government continues to pursue the goal of a mixed economy, encouraging private sector development and foreign investment, particularly for export production.

Human rights continued to be respected in Belize in 1984. Constitutional protections for the fundamental rights and freedoms of the individual are upheld by an independent judiciary and an equitable justice system. A free press and competitive electoral politics also serve to protect civil and political rights. There were no cases of political violence.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Unlawful or arbitrary deprivation of life and politically motivated killings were not reported in Belize during 1984.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of disappearances in Belize during 1984.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Such treatment is prohibited by the Belizean Constitution and does not in practice take place.

Although penalties for possession and trafficking in illicit drugs were stiffened in 1984, sentences for these and other crimes are generally lenient compared to sentences imposed for similar crimes elsewhere in the region. The Government recognizes that prison facilities and prison service staff need upgrading, but continuing public sector financial constraints limit its ability to make these improvements. While prisons continue to be crowded, prisoners are adequately fed and have comparatively generous social and recreational privileges. Press reports of alleged police brutality involving rough handling of suspects declined during 1984.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution prohibits arbitrary imprisonment and guarantees the right of habeas corpus. A person is entitled to be informed within 48 hours of arrest of the reason for the detention and to be brought before a court within 72 hours. Release on bail is allowed for all but the most serious, violent criminal offenses. These procedural safeguards are routinely observed.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution specifically guarantees due process and the rights of accused persons: presumption of innocence, privilege against self-incrimination, right to counsel, and public trial. Trial by jury is mandatory in criminal cases. Protection for the integrity of the person in law corresponds to the actual practice of the courts. The judiciary is independent of the executive and is regarded as an effective guarantor of an equitable judicial system. There are no political prisoners in Belize.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution provides for the protection of family life, personal property, the privacy of the home, and recognition of human dignity. No violations of these guarantees have been reported during the past year.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The freedom of speech and press are guaranteed in the Constitution and respected in practice. The Government controls Belize's only radio station, but a wide range of political opinion is represented in the country's press. The opposition and independent newspapers are frequently critical of the Government. There are seven privately owned and operated television stations in Belize. A new broadcasting law was enacted in 1983, and the Government moved to implement it the following year by appointing a six-member board, the Belize Broadcasting Authority. The Authority has begun the process of licensing existing stations, but it has not acted to impair the freedom of television broadcasting.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Constitutional guarantees of freedom of assembly and association and the right to form and belong to trade unions are respected in practice. Permits are required to hold public meetings, but such permits are routinely granted. There are eight independent labor unions representing approximately fifteen percent of the labor force. The National Trade Union Congress of Belize is affiliated with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions through membership in the Caribbean Congress of Labor. Belizean unions engage in the full range of union activities. Labor disputes are normally settled through arbitration; the Labor Commissioner or joint labor-management panels serve as mediators. The Government has been expanding its contacts with the International Labor Organization (ILO) and is preparing for Belizean representation at the ILO, possibly in 1985.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is no state religion. More than fifteen Christian denominations and a few non-Christian denominations worship freely. The vast majority of Belize's primary and secondary schools are operated by churches. Church leaders have long had close ties to the political establishment, and churches play an active role in the tasks of social and national development.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no restrictions on movement within Belize or on foreign travel and emigration. Emigration is principally motivated by economic reasons and not by political or human rights considerations, and emigrants frequently return for family visits. Aliens convicted of crimes, particularly drug offenses or entry into Belize without proper documentation, are usually deported.

Belize continues to attract displaced persons and immigrants from other Central American countries. In 1984, the Government moved to regularize the status of aliens who had entered Belize and were residing there without proper permits. The Government decreed a ninety-day amnesty period (May 2 to July 31) during which illegal aliens were required to register with the police and immigration authorities. A total of 8,558 aliens registered. None was subject to arrest, prosecution, or deportation for being in Belize illegally.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Following the general election of December 1984, Belize experienced a peaceful transfer of national governmental power from the PUP to the UDP. Although the ruling party's parliamentary majority gives it broad freedom to decide government policy, its exercise of political power is limited by public opinion, a free press, an independent judiciary, and genuinely competitive electoral politics. Political participation is broadly based. All citizens over 18 are eligible to vote and both the PUP and the UDP engage in voter registration campaigns. All ethnic groups in the population are represented in both major parties. In addition, there are two small parties in Belize, the Christian Democratic Party whose activities are centered in the Dangriga-Stann Creek area, and the Toledo Progressive Party in Punta Gorda. Participation in local and national elections is traditionally high in Belize; approximately 90 percent of the electorate voted in the general election in 1979 and 74 percent voted in the 1984 election.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

No international entities have asked to investigate the human rights situation in Belize. A private human rights council and a branch of Amnesty International exist in Belize. Given the favorable human rights environment, the activities of these two organizations have been very limited. Freedom House was the only outside organization to report on the human rights situation in Belize in 1984; its report rated Belize "free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The population grew to 158,000 inhabitants in 1984. The rate of population growth remains stable at 2.3 percent for 1984 due to large-scale emigration. Life expectancy at birth is over 65 years, while the infant mortality rate is 54.9 per thousand live births. According to the latest World Bank figures available, per capita gross national product was $1,083 in 1982. Real income remained basically unchanged from the previous year; unemployment (14.2 percent) and underemployment also remained at 1983 levels. The adult literacy rate is 91.2 percent and 80 percent of the population has access to safe water (both figures are 1970 World Bank estimates). The ratio of caloric supply available for consumption to nutritional requirements was 111 percent in 1977. The health care system is not able to provide basic health care for all Belizeans.

Women in Belize are faced with discrimination rooted in cultural, social, and economic structures. There is no official policy of discrimination, however, and the Government seeks the participation of women in the nation's political and developmental process. Belizean women are active in unions, political parties, private voluntary organizations, and churches. They are prominent in local and national government and well represented in the professions. The Governor General, who represents the British monarch in Belize, is a woman. Women also hold officer and enlisted positions in the police and the BDF.

BOLIVIA

The October 10, 1982 inauguration of Hernan Siles Zuazo marked the return to constitutionally elected government in Bolivia after 18 years of practically uninterrupted military rule.

The Siles administration has survived a difficult two years of social tension, labor unrest, and frequent coup threats, and still faces overwhelming political and economic problems. The ideological, regional, and racial cleavages which have historically divided Bolivia have been sharpened by the worst economic crisis in half a century. In addition, Bolivia's fragile democratic institutions were threatened by a Presidential kidnapping and aborted coup effort on June 30, 1984. The President was apprehended by a small group of military and police officers, and released unharmed 12 hours later when the action failed to attract broader military and civilian support. The Government has undergone seven cabinet crises in two years with an ever narrowing base of popular support, while the opposition forces, which now control the Congress, have mounted intense political pressure. The departure of the Christian Democratic Party from the ruling political coalition in October 1984 further weakened the Government. In an effort to diffuse mounting political pressures for his resignation, President Siles offered in November 1984 to advance presidential elections one year to June 1985. Shortly thereafter, the Communist Party departed the ruling political coalition in protest against the President's refusal to extend state control to key sectors of the economy.

In spite of rich natural resources and sparse population, Bolivia remains one of the poorest countries in South America. The state enterprises which dominate the export sector have stagnated for years; many are now nearly bankrupt. The staggering economic problems which the Siles Government inherited worsened with the world economic recession and the "El Nino" floods and droughts that affected the Andean Region in 1982-83. The continuing failure to enact a coherent economic recovery policy has caused a continual decline in the standard of living and increasing political discontent and desperation.

Bolivia's most notable progress since the end of military government in 1982 has been in the area of human rights. Political parties are now free to organize and criticize the Government. Both Congress and the court system function independently and fulfill an active monitoring function. After several delays, municipal elections are now scheduled for June, 1985. The excesses of the former security police apparatus are a thing of the past. No political prisoners are being held, and many of the persons arrested in connection with the June 30 coup conspiracy have been released.

The press continues to operate without government restriction, although pressures by extremist political groups on the Bolivian media have grown over the past six months. The Government has dealt with an increasing wave of general strikes, road blockades, and labor protests with restraint. It has been less effective in protecting property rights and providing guarantees for private sector activities.

In August 1984 the Government sent military and police forces into the Chapare, the major cocaine-producing region, in orderto regain control of an area that had been almost completely taken over by narcotics traffickers. Although campesino organizations threatened violent resistance and claimed systematic human rights abuses by the police, so far no such pattern has been documented.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

The Government does not condone political killing. The shooting to death of a prominent agro-industrialist in August 1984 set off a general strike by the Confederation of Private Entrepreneurs (CEPB) which maintains that the killing was politically motivated since it followed months of harassment and death threats by campesino union activists, and claims that appeals to the Government for protection had been ignored. Although police say they have identified the murderer, the CEPB raised doubts about the hasty and incomplete investigation. Two months later the farm owner's widow appealed to the Senate for assistance, saying that the violent threats and interventions by campesinos designed to drive the family off their property had not ended.

The Government has left to private organizations such as the Association of the Families of Missing Persons, ASOFAM, the task of prosecuting the 15 "paramilitaries" who were arrested in February 1983 and charged with the murders of prominent political figures under the Garcia Meza regime. The process has become stalled in the courts, and little outside pressure has been brought to bear to push it to completion.

In May 1984 a bomb exploded outside the Military Supreme Court Building killing a corporal who was standing guard. While those responsible were not discovered, the Commander of the Armed Forces issued a statement indicating that the terrorist attack was meant to intimidate the members of the court who were prosecuting the "Luribay Seven" defendants for guerrilla activities.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of politically inspired disappearances in Bolivia in 1984.

To investigate the disappearance of political opponents under previous regimes, the Siles administration in 1982 created the National Missing Persons Commission, with representatives from the Executive Branch, the Congress, the Permanent Assembly of Human Rights, the armed forces, the Catholic Church, the Bolivian Red Cross, and ASOFAM. In December, the Commission presented to the UN Commission on Human Rights a report on 207cases of disappearance during the last 18 years. According to the report, 52 of these cases have been solved while the remaining cases are still being investigated.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Siles Goverment has stated that it does not and will not employ torture. Shortly after coming to power it abolished all state security agencies which had been used by previous military governments to intimidate opponents. Human rights groups have argued, however, that torture, even though notauthorized by the Government, may still take place in the early stages of detention due to the fact that many of the lower-level military personnel responsible for abuses by preceeding military regimes are still in place.

The seven persons detained by the Bolivian army for guerrilla activities near Luribay in Loayza Province in October 1983 complained that they were tortured by the military. According to the representatives of the Permanent Assembly of Human Rights who met twice with the detainees, the methods used on them included beatings, immersion in water, electric shocks, and threats by masked men to shoot them unless they made confessions. Evidence of such mistreatment was corroborated by a priest who was allowed to visit the detainees with a doctor and reported their findings to the President, who reportedly instructed the Defense Minister to ensure that the abuses stop. Thereafter, the prisoners reported their treatment improved.

On December 14, 1983, a Navy non-commissioned officer died while under detention in the Naval Military School for alleged involvement in selling arms to leftist political groups. The Navy and the Medical College stated that the death resulted from a heart attack. However, the man's family and other naval officers asserted that he died because of beatings and electric shocks received in detention. They presented their evidence to several La Paz newspapers. The widow and her family pressed for the President to punish those responsible including the Commander of the Navy, who was later replaced by the Government. On April 12 the family brought suit against the ex-Commander and other Navy officials for alleged complicity in torture.

Of the 29 persons arrested for suspected involvement in the June 30 coup attempt, two complained of torture and mistreatment while being questioned in the Ministry of Interior. Following the first public accusations by the President of the Senate Human Rights Committee, the Government denied any abuses and invited the press and human rights and international organizations to visit the detainees. The Permanent Association of Human Rights and the Bolivian Red Cross interviewed most of the detainees but found no evidence of mistreatment. A prominent civic leader who complained of having been subject to beating, electric shocks, and cold water showers refused to be examined by independent doctors, making his charges impossible to verify. When, following their release, the two detainees again voiced complaints of having been tortured, the Interior Minister vehemently denied the charges and threatened to sue for slander.

Most problems of prisoner mistreatment arise from chronically overcrowded prison conditions and the lack of properly trained prison and police personnel. San Pedro Prison in La Paz, which was built to house 300, now holds over 1,000 prisoners. Corruption, malnutrition, and unsanitary conditions are widespread. Prisoners pay guards for food, better cells, passes, contraband liquor, and drugs. In August 1984, prisoners staged a hunger strike to protest food shortages and the retardation of justice.

The growing economic and social unrest, coupled with continuing political agitation by leftist groups, has generated a series of peasant and union takeovers of private firms and property. Four incidents involved hostage-taking of local management and technicians in private mines and factories while at least a dozen others involved armed seizure or occupations of private property. The Government has not responded publicly to these assaults, causing private entrepreneurs to protest that citizens' lives and property are being endangered with impunity and that government protections are non-existent.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Under the Constitution, no one can be arrested without a court order and detainees must be charged or freed within 24 hours. From the moment of detention, detainees have the right to be represented by an attorney, and any interested party may demand a writ of habeas corpus before a superior court or local judge. These rights are often not honored because of a detainee's lack of education or economic resources, or because of the built-in inefficiency and slowness of the judicial system.

Since the return to constitutional democracy, Bolivians have been largely free of the fear of being arrested or exiled for their political views. In May 1984 a foreign journalist was held for questioning for allegedly misquoting a government official concerning narcotics, and a radio personality who is critical of the Government was detained briefly in July. But in both cases the public uproar caused the Siles Administration to act quickly and reverse the actions of subordinates.

Following the abortive coup and presidential kidnapping on June 30, the Government arrested 29 civilians and military and police officials for suspected involvement in the events. Most were held incommunicado for a period of at least several days. However, the Government was subjected to continual public pressure to make sure there were no violations of human rights. While nearly all the prisoners said they were well-treated, most complained of the long unnecessary detentions.

By late September, 14 of the detainees had been released either for lack of evidence after questioning or because of intervention by the District Court of La Paz. Two were being held by the military and 13 had been transferred to San Pedro prison to await civilian trial. Five other officials of the police and military who had sought refuge in the Venezuelan Embassy were given safe conduct for temporary residence in Spain, while the status of three other civilians who sought refuge in the Uruguayan Embassy is still undetermined.

The Government has continued to seek to expel leading violators of human rights under previous regimes from Bolivia. In August Bolivian authorities arrested Emilio Carbone Bagigalupo and charged him with conspiring against state security, belonging to paramilitary organizations, and involvement in narcotics trafficking. Carbone, an Italian citizen, was active in the neo-Fascist group called the Italian Socialist Movement and involved in the 1980 coup which ousted President Lydia Gueiler. The Government has initiated legal procedures to expel him to Italy.

Argentine national Mario Mingolla, who was arrested in December 1982 for paramilitary activities, including an alleged plot against the life of Vice-President Jaime Paz Zamora, left his confinement in February 1984 and later claimed he had been freed by order of the Ministry of Interior. The Interior Minister in turn asserted that he was not being held prisoner, but had asked the Government for"protective custody" because of the danger of returning to his native country. Although the Government had found no evidence of the assassination plot, Mingolla was held for 14 months without formal charges, during which time the Government tried informally to arrange for his asylum in a third country. His long detention had become a cause of criticism from church and human rights groups, but interested parties found no foreign government willing to give him asylum.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Government has upheld the right to fair public trial, but delays are common.

The seven persons detained by the Army near Luribay in October, 1983 for alleged involvement in training of leftist groups were tried by a military court for stealing arms, falsifying their identity, and attempted treason. The seven-month trial sparked an international controversy, as the families of the accused and Bolivian and international human rights organizations insisted that the military had no jurisdiction to try the case. The military prosecutor argued that because the group was using military arms and uniforms and was illegally carrying out combat training activities, the military court was competent to hear the case. The defense attorneys appealed the jurisdictional question to the Bolivian Supreme Court, but lost. On October 12, the Permanent Military Tribunal sentenced the defendants to two to six years in prison. The defense then appealed the decision to the Supreme Tribunal of Military Justice.

The "Luribay" controversy became more complicated after 11 members of a conservative youth group were arrested near Santa Cruz on October 20, 1984 for illegal possession of arms. Although the Interior Minister said the youths should have been turned over to the military court, they were released on their own recognizance pending a civilian trial. This led to public charges that the Government operated under a double standard of justice, prompting President Siles on October 25 to announce he would grant amnesty to the "Luribay Seven." Although the Government subsequently issued a supreme decree ordering their immediate release, military lawyers challenged the constitutionality of the decree, and the decision whether to release the "Luribay Seven" now rests with the Supreme Tribunal of Military Justice. In a separate decision on a request for a writ of habeas corpus presented by the defendants, the District Court of La Paz rejected that petition arguing that under the Constitution the Armed Forces are subordinate to the Constitution and the Supreme Military Tribunal should therefore carry out the Presidential Amnesty Decree.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home or Correspondence

The sanctity of the home and the privacy of citizens' lives are protected by the Constitution and respected in practice. House searches, monitoring of conversations, and other abuses that occurred under military regimes in the past have stopped.

After the Government declared the cocaine-producing Chapare valley a military zone in August, there were concerns expressed over warrantless entries. In September and October the Permanent Assembly of Human Rights investigated complaints from peasant groups of widespread abuses, but found them contradictory and difficult to document. Although a few cases of robbery by the security forces had occurred, there was no systematic pattern of abuse.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

There are no government restrictions on free speech or the press. The views of opposition parties, leaders and organizations--often harshly critical of the Government--are given free play in the press, radio, and most television stations. President Siles has repeatedly confirmed the Government's commitment to unfettered freedom of expression.

Some extremist political and labor groups, taking exception to these liberties, have called for the closing or takeover of certain newspapers and radio stations. Although the wave of newspaper bombings which occurred in late 1983 has subsided, one La Paz daily and several radio stations in Santa Cruz and La Paz suffered dynamite blasts in 1984. No one claimed responsibility for the bombings, and no suspects have been arrested. Both the threats of closure and the terrorist attacks were strongly condemned by public figures.

Another matter of concern to local journalists is the recently enacted Bolivian Press Law which creates strict qualifications for those allowed to work as journalists and calls for a quasi-public commission to rule on applications to the College of Professional Journalists, which would control entry to the profession. While the full effects of the law have not yet been felt in the Bolivian press, many fear that it could lead to coercion or manipulation by governmental authorities, and that it preempts constitutional guarantees of free speech by limiting access to the media only to accredited journalists.

In television, the network of state and university channels has been controlled by the Government, effectively shutting out the conservative opposition. Unauthorized private TV stations have been functioning in Santa Cruz, Sucre, and Cochabamba, and the Government has been unwilling to legalize them. When a new station began operations in La Paz in October 1984, the Ministry of Transport and Communications announced it would confiscate the private operator's equipment and apply a 1980 law which prohibits private TV channels. The station owners, the press, and the congressional opposition responded that the threats of closure represented an unconstitutional incursion on freedom of expression. The Government has since taken a more conciliatory position.

All Bolivian universities are part of the state-run system except Catholic University in La Paz, the Protestant College in Santa Cruz, the private University of Santa Cruz, which was founded in January 1984 on free enterprise principles, and the new Bahai-related Nur University, which recently received government authorization.

BOLIVIA

Academic freedom is recognized in the Fundamental Law of the Bolivian University passed in 1972, but political activists in student and campus-governing bodies have seriously interfered with the exercise of this right. Under the present system of "professor-student co-management" in the state universities, students have a 50 percent voice in every decision-making committee. Leftist activists have used this power to make appointments which ignore academic credentials in favor of ideological purity, to replace professors who disagree withthem politically, and to impose their ideas on the student body.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The current Government has not attempted to restrict peaceful assembly and association. Labor unions, which played an active role in the restoration of democracy in 1982, have freely exercised their right to recruit, negotiate, and strike. The Senate has yet to act on repealing a constitutional provision prohibiting union activity by public employees, but the ban has not been invoked by the Siles Government. Virtually all Bolivian workers in the mining, industrial, public, and service sectors are organized.

The International Labor Organization's Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations commended the Bolivian government in 1983 for its efforts to bring the country's legislation into conformity with the Convention on Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize.

The umbrella labor federation which represents the majority of Bolivian workers is independent, politically very powerful, and, indeed, frequently demonstrates a capacity to paralyze the economy with crippling strikes. It has campaigned for an "emergency social-economic program" as an alternative to the Government's economic adjustment measures. It has also pressured the Government to postpone debt servicing with private international banks. The number of strikes, work stoppages, road blockades, plant takeovers, and other militant actions kept rising in 1984 as workers reacted against food shortages and the drastic loss of purchasing power in a deteriorating economy.

Private sector owners and managers have also become increasingly organized and vocal in defending their interests. In 1984 the Confederation of Private Entrepreneurs carried out two general strikes to protest the Government's failure to consult them on national wage standards or to defend private property and citizens against violent assaults. In June 1984 the organization also filed a protest with the ILO over the Government's disregard for tripartite standards in setting economic and wage policies. The ILO will reportedy send a committee to investigate the claims.

c. Freedom of Religion

Citizens are free to practice the religion of their choice, and there are no restrictions on publishing, establishing places of worship and religious schools, training clergy, or maintaining international ties. Bolivian law requires that religious groups be incorporated, but there is no state control or censorship. Since the return to civilian government, no clergy have been persecuted for their political beliefs or activities.

BOLIVIA

Roman Catholicism is the predominant religion in Bolivia. Catholic bishops receive a nominal stipend from the state, but no other secular advantage is conferred. Protestant churches operate openly and freely. In 1982, a Protestant college opened in Santa Cruz. The Mormons and Seventh Day Adventists proselytize and run churches and training centers throughout the country. There are Bahai and Hare Krishna centers in La Paz. The small Jewish community is not disturbed as it was under military regimes, which tolerated neo-Nazi "paramilitary" groups that published anti-Semitic tracts. The Mennonites have large colonies in Santa Cruz.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no unusual restrictions on travel within the country or abroad.

Since May 26, 1982, all political exiles from previous military regimes have been allowed to return. A program coordinated by the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) facilitated the return of 1,901 Bolivians in 1983 and 224 in 1984. The Intergovernmental Committee on Migration is assisting other Bolivians who wish to reunite with their families.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change their Government

The inauguration of President Siles on October 18, 1982 culminated a long effort to restore freely elected, democratic government to Bolivia. Although he had received a plurality in the 1980 Presidential elections, he was prevented from taking office by a military coup led by General Luis Garcia Meza. Over two years later, the Congress which had been elected in 1980 was finally seated and chose Siles as President under constitutional procedures.

The next presidential election, originally scheduled for 1986, has been moved up to June 1985 when municipal elections are also to take place for the first time since 1949. The latter have been delayed twice due to inaction by both the executive branch and the Congress in providing funds, naming representatives to the Electoral Court, deciding on revisions in the electoral law, and enacting the Law of Municipalities.

Fifteen political parties and fronts plus numerous schismatic and independent movements are represented in the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate. A myriad of other parties covering the ideological spectrum also function, although they have no elected officials. The Congress, which is controlled by the opposition, has played an active, aggressive role in monitoring the policies of the executive branch.

The political system is dominated by persons of largely European origin. Those following a traditional Indian lifestyle and speaking Aymara or Quechua as a primary language, who make up an estimated 60 percent of the population, have little opportunity to advance to top positions because of economic disadvantages and cultural isolation. However, Indians have served in cabinet-level positions, and there are several Indian Congressmen.

BOLIVIA

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government has been sensitive to the opinions of both international and non-governmental organizations regarding alleged violations of civil liberties and has made human rights its most consistent public theme. In October 1984 the Inter-American Human Rights Commission of the OAS removed Bolivia from its list of countries under special consideration and commended the Siles administration for maintaining a policy of respect for human rights in spite of high social tensions and numerous attempts to destabilize the constitutional Government. Freedom House in 1984 again gave Bolivia a rating of "free." Amnesty International in its 1984 report commented on the Siles' Government's efforts to investigate cases of past disappearances, but expressed concern about the slowness of these investigations and the delays in bringing those responsible to trial.

Of non-governmental organizations, the Catholic Church, the Permanent Assembly on Human Rights, and the press have been the most aggessive monitors of human rights in Bolivia. The Bolivian Episcopal Conference of the Catholic Church and some Protestant ministers played a role in the past in visiting detainees and speaking out against abuses. Individual Catholic bishops, many priests, and such lay groups as the Bacherer Foundation and the Confederation of Lay Persons have been active in the investigation of social problems and, occasionally, human rights issues.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The World Bank's Development Report estimated Bolivia's population in 1984 at 6.04 million with a growth rate of 2.6 percent. Current estimates by the National Institute of Statistics place the population at 6.25 million. Life expectancy at birth is estimated at 51.8 years. The infant mortality rate, the highest in South America according to UNICEF, is 122 per 1000 live births. Data from the 1976 census indicates that 291 out of 1000 rural children die before their fifth year, compared to 186 per 1000 urban children. Only 38 percent of the population had access to safe water in 1976 (the last year for which this statistic is available), and the caloric supply available for consumption relative to nutritional requirements was only 86.6 percent in 1977.

World Bank figures show the adult literacy rate was 63.2 percent in 1976, but more recent Bolivian estimates place it at about 73 percent. Public education is free and generally available in urban areas, but the school year is often interrupted by strikes and protests. Except in the most isolated areas, Bolivian rural youth can expect at least three years of schooling. The primary school enrollment ratio was approximately 108.22 for 1981.

For the past several years Bolivia has endured a severe, worsening economic crisis which was deepened by the world recession and by natural disasters in 1982-83. Inflation, stagnation, and the lack of foreign exchange produced sharp drops in Bolivia's mineral exports and agricultural production, resulting in real losses in gross domestic production (GDP) of eight percent in 1982 and nine percent in 1983.

BOLIVIA

In 1984 inflation exceeded 1000 percent. Bolivian Central Bank statistics show that real per capita income, already the lowest in Latin America, has fallen by 34.3 percent since 1980. Bolivia is also burdened by a huge fiscal deficit accounting for nearly 20 percent of GDP and a $3.5 billion international debt which could claim 60 percent of foreign earnings over the next three years. The only bright spot is the agricultural sector, which is back to pre-1982 production levels and could generate a one percent growth in GDP in 1984.

The democratic Government, faced with intense pressure from the powerful Labor Confederation and political groups on the left, has failed to enact coherent policies to stabilize the economy. This paralysis has led to hoarding, speculation, and smuggling and consequent shortages in basic goods such as sugar, bread, flour, meat, coffee, gas and kerosene. While hunger has not yet reached epidemic proportions, futher economic decline could cause serious social and political disorder.

Since 1952 racial discrimination has been banned in Bolivia. However, informal discrimination persists against persons of Indian background by those persons who believe they have more claim to European ancestry and who tend to have higher incomes and social positions.

Women do not enjoy a status in society equal to that of men. The main obstacles to advancement are cultural traditions, social conditions, and a lack of political power. In rural families women contribute significantly to economic activities but are considered subordinate and rarely participate in cooperatives, community meetings, or training programs. In Hispanic urban families, women are more likely to stay at home and are not economically active. However, women are slowly achieving a greater role in Bolivian business life.

While in general Bolivian laws do not discriminate against women, under the agrarian reform law, title to land cannot pass to a woman even if she is widowed or divorced. Also, agricultural credit to women is restricted by most banks and lending institutions. Although by law women workers have the right to three months maternity leave, in practice most are unaware of this right or are concerned that they will lose their salary or jobs if they take such leave. The Chamber of Deputies recently formed a Women's Commission which plans to work with the many organizations concerned with women's advancement and to challenge discriminatory practices. It has proposed reform legislation for the unionization of domestic workers and their inclusion in the social security system.

Although there is no overt political discrimination against women, they are rarely named to high-ranking positions in the Government. The most notable exception was Lydia Gueiler, who served as interim President from November 1979 to July 1980. The Congress which convened in October 1982 included three women Deputies along with a number of women as alternate Deputies and Senators.

BRAZIL

The Government of Brazil, composed of civilians and military officers, is headed by Joao Figueiredo, the fifth retired general to occupy that post since the imposition of military-dominated governments in 1964. However, with the support of the military, President Figueiredo in 1984 continued a policy aimed at restoring full civilian political control. An electoral college will choose a new president on January 15, 1985. Neither of the two candidates, both civilians, was chosen because of military preference.

There was a groundswell of popular support in 1984 for direct presidential elections, but the Government opposed them for 1984 or 1985, and several constitutional amendments designed to institute them were defeated in Congress. However, each of the presidential candidates has promised to restore the direct vote for the election of his successor.

The center of political power is the presidency. It has various constitutional and legal devices which constitute decisive authority within the Brazilian legal framework. The Brazilian Congress continues to play an active and vocal role in national policy-making. The combined opposition gained a majority of seats in the lower house as a result of the November 1982 elections, in which candidates were chosen by direct vote. The judiciary is a widely respected and independent institution.

Brazil has an internal security apparatus composed of a national intelligence service, a federal police system, a militia-type state police, local police, and military intelligence units. Many knowledgeable Brazilians believe that the government apparatus continues to be used to monitor opposition elements which pose no apparent security threat to the nation. They believe, however, that there is considerably less of this activity than in previous years. There have also been charges in the press and by human rights organizations that the local and military police have used excessive violence in apprehending and processing alleged criminals. Critics claim that this practice is widespread, though possibly on the decline.

Economic recession, though serious, has not impeded President Figueiredo from pursuing his policy of political liberalization. Brazil is the eighth largest economy in the non-communist world, yet it must cope with a foreign debt of approximately 100 billion dollars, high inflation and four consecutive years of low or negative per capita growth. A bright spot in the Brazilian economy has been its ability to adjust its external sector to current international financial conditions, in large part because of the surprisingly large growth in its trade surplus.

The state of human rights generally continued to improve in 1984, reinforcing the long term trend. Brazilians are largely free to participate in the political and economic life of the country. The President may, however, invoke constitutionally sanctioned emergency powers, and has authority to issue decree laws. The Government issued a decree of Emergency Measures on April 18, ostensibly to preserve order during a controversial vote in the national congress. The decree, affecting principally the Brasilia area, imposed briefly censorship of radio and television broadcasts and a suspension of freedom of assembly and association. Brazil has a National Security Law which provides for a military trial of civilians charged under it. However, in late 1983 Congress passed a law to narrow its scope very substantially. This amendment resulted in the release of all persons incarcerated under the National Security Law.

Under the current civil code, Brazilian Indians are considered "semi competent" wards of the state and live under certain restrictions which are not applicable to other citizens. Indians are under pressure from mineral and agricultural developers, as well as squatters and legitimate settlers, to open more of their lands to others.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There have been no reports of political killings in 1984. However, there have been charges by human rights organizations that the civil and military police in Rio have on occasion killed individuals suspected of common crimes. The National Conference of Brazilian Bishops (CNBB) notes, however, that the situation in Rio has improved compared to recent years. Several policemen were convicted in 1984 for offenses relating to treatment of suspects. The CNBB believes these convictions have served as a deterrent to police abuse. Church officials estimate that in Sao Paulo several hundred suspects were killed by the police in the past twelve months with the state police (Policia Militar) being the worst offenders. The church perceives no improvement in Sao Paulo in this area for the past several years and believes insufficient resources have been devoted by the local or state government to combat the problem.

b. Disappearance

There have been no reports of politically motivated abductions.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture is prohibited by the penal code. There have been no reports of politically motivated torture in 1984. However, various human rights and professional organizations report that police beatings and torture of individuals suspected of common crimes are widespread. The primary purpose of these abuses, according to these organizations, is to extract confessions. Such practices primarily affect the underprivileged. Church authorities note that in Rio there has been a steady decline in such offenses in the last two years due to government efforts to curb mistreatment of suspects. In Sao Paulo, the practice reportedly remains widespread with little change over the past several years.

Prison facilities continue to be overcrowded and poorly maintained and managed. In Sao Paulo, reportedly, there has not been any money appropriated for prison improvement in the past four years. There has, however, been a recent effort to organize prisoner groups within Sao Paulo prisons, with the aim of allowing the prisoners to articulate their own grievances and to pass these to appropriate government officials.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The independent judiciary is largely successful in guaranteeing due process of law for citizens. Under Brazilian law, an individual may not be arbitrarily detained. Habeas corpus is guaranteed by the Brazilian constitution and is respected.

Provisional detention is permissible under Brazilian criminal law. It is ordered by judges (in cases of common crimes) or by certain high-level administrative authorities (in cases of crimes against the public administration, or of extradition), not by police. A judge may order provisional detention, for example, to preserve public order when there is evidence of probable cause, when the accused is dangerous or does not have a fixed job or address, or when the individual is caught in the act of an unbailable crime. It may also be ordered to prevent interference by the accused in criminal proceedings, e.g., when the individual might influence or harm witnesses. Provisional detention can be extended until the case comes to trial or until a judge rules that reasons for the detention no longer exist. Provisional detention in Brazil is not practiced arbitrarily and does not normally lead to long periods of incarceration.

Individuals charged with violating the National Security Law may be held in custody for 30 days. This 30-day period may be renewed only by a judicial authority. The accused may be held incommunicado for 5 days. A judicial authority must be notified immediately (in practice, within 24 hours) in the event of an arrest. The judge is required to make a determination of the legality of the arrest and the police must inform the accused of the charges. An attorney may file a habeas corpus request on behalf of the prisoner if the judge decides that the prisoner was arrested illegally. In practice, all deadlines for notifications and determinations are strictly adhered to.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The right to a fair public trial is guaranteed by Brazilian law with regard to both penal code and National Security Law violations, and is respected in practice. Defendants are entitled to counsel and must be made fully aware of the charges against them. In cases where a defendant cannot afford an attorney, one must be provided free of charge. Defendants and their attorneys have the legal right to be informed of the evidence on which the charges are based. Cases may be tried before a single judge or by jury, except in the case of willful crimes against life, in which case a jury trial is mandated.

The Brazilian judicial system is an independent branch of government. The Federal Supreme Court is the highest court in the land. The federal court system of Brazil is composed of courts of the first instance and appeals courts. The states are free to organize their own judicial systems as long as they do not violate basic principles of the federal Constitution. Brazil also has a system of specialized courts such as labor courts, electoral courts and juvenile courts.

BRAZIL

Brazil has a military court system charged with the responsibility of hearing cases involving military personnel, and cases involving civilians charged under the National Security Law or with offenses against military installations. Legal guarantees also apply in military courts. Civilians have the right to appeal to the Federal Supreme Court when convicted of crimes against the National Security Law. Military personnel also may appeal to the Federal Supreme Court in national security cases, but only in extraordinary circumstances. In current practice, there is a trend towards dismissing National Security Law cases or charging individuals under other laws and referring cases to the civilian legal system. At present, there are no individuals imprisoned in Brazil under the National Security Law. The last person in jail under this law was a journalist released in April 1984. There is one member of Congress currently charged under the "crimes against honor" provision of the National Security Law for making a speech considered insulting to the President of the Republic.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home or Correspondence

There continue to be allegations that the Government selectively employs warrantless wiretaps of opposition group members. However, illegal wiretapping apparently has been less frequent in recent years. Forced entry into homes without a warrant probably occurs in searches for criminals, but this practice has declined in recent years, according to human rights organizations. There are no reports of such illegal entries of homes in political cases. Freedom from search is a constitutionally guaranteed right. This right was suspended for a period of roughly two weeks in Brasilia by decree law in April 1984. The Government explained the issuance of the decree as a necessary measure to maintain order during a controversial vote in the national Congress.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The right to free speech and to a free press are guaranteed in the Brazilian Constitution. Opposition viewpoints are generally aired freely in various media. The Government has exhibited tolerance of criticism, which at times has become quite strong.

Newspapers are privately owned and are vigorous in reporting on and discussing government policies and performance. In April 1984, an editor who had been convicted under the National Security Law for publishing "subversive propaganda" was released by unanimous vote of the Supreme Court. There have been attempts by the Government to mute criticism of its policies by selected newspapers by withdrawing advertising of government-controlled corporations. In early 1984, this occurred for a two-month period, resulting in economic hardship for the newspapers but no perceptible change in their editorial policies. However, in October local police in the small northern city of Belem raided a printing plant which had often been used by leftist groups.

Self-censorship is rare, being restricted to a very few subjects such as sharp and specific criticisms of the armed forces, the President, etc. The Inter-American Press Association listed Brazil as having a "free press".

Radio and television stations are also privately owned, but the Government can withdraw their licenses fairly easily. Electronic media broadcasts have covered a vast array of topics, including controversial social topics and political issues during this past year. However, in April, the Government, by virtue of the April 18 emergency decree, imposed media censorship of radio and television coverage of debate on a controversial bill before Congress. During this period of roughly two weeks, news programs were affected and one popular television public affairs program was canceled entirely. Also during April, the Government blacked out two radio stations outside of Brasilia for several hours because the stations decided to cover the controversial vote in the national Congress. According to Amnesty International, television and radio exercise more self-censorship than the print media in topics dealing with government personalities and policies.

Foreign publications, except for those from the Soviet Union and Eastern bloc countries, are widely distributed in Brazil. In 1984, a Brazilian journalist who had written a book praising Cuba was detained by Brazilian authorities for several hours and copies of his book were seized when he tried to bring them into Brazil from Cuba. All foreign and domestic films are reviewed for political content, but films are rarely barred from commercial distribution. In 1984, the Government released about 10 films that it had held up for years, some dating from the 1960's.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Brazilian Constitution guarantees the right to peaceably assemble, and the right is generally observed. The right of association is restricted only in the case of proscribed political parties. These parties are held to be illegal on grounds that they do not uphold democratic principles--a requirement placed on all parties. Although permits must be obtained for outdoor public meetings of a political or labor-union nature, they are normally freely given--with the exception of permits for illegal communist groups. For example, in January and February 1984, millions of people rallied in major cities to protest the Government's electoral policies. There was no attempt to harass or stop these huge demonstrations. The rallies were generally peaceful, with little interference by the Government. However, in mid-1984, the Government acted vigorously to suppress substantial, open participation of the outlawed communist parties in the presidential campaign rallies.

Labor has the right to organize and to meet freely. In fact, labor unions are legally mandated under the code of labor laws to represent workers. Although the labor code makes no provision for a "central" or umbrella labor organization, two rival "centrals" have emerged. The Government has not recognized them, but it has allowed these organizations to function. To maintain the official labor structure workers are taxed one day's pay per year, a sum which is paid to the Government and then divided among confederations, federations and local unions. Perhaps 10 to 15 percent of workers voluntarily pay union dues in addition to the mandatory tax. Most of these voluntary members join more for family health benefits than for representation regarding wages or working conditions. Unions are legally prohibited from participating in partisan politics, but a number do. To date, however, their impact has been small.

Strikes are severely restricted by obligatory arbitration procedures. Notwithstanding restrictions on the right to strike after binding arbitration, stronger unions have won a number of strikes for higher wages during the past year.

Employers have a legally mandated structure which parallels that of Labor. In addition there are voluntary employer organizations not mandated by law. Both the mandatory and voluntary associations represent their members to the government and act as lobbyists. An even more important function is negotiation of collective bargaining agreements with the labor unions.

Unions of workers and employers can maintain ties with international organizations such as the ICFTU, but this affiliation has to be approved by the President of Brazil and the transfer of funds to pay membership charges has to pass through the Central Bank. The President has pending a number of applications from labor organizations requesting association with international organizations; there are even more applications pending with the Central Bank for funds to pay international dues.

The International Labor Organization (ILO) received several complaints concerning Brazilian unions and union leaders during 1983 and 1984. One dealt with the trial of the Agricultural Workers Confederation president, Jose Francisco da Silva, and Workers Party president, Lula da Silva, under the National Security Law. The two men, as well as others, were indicted for incitement to riot and subsequently acquitted. Another case presented to the ILO concerned a rural workers' union president who was assassinated in Paraiba state. The murderers have been tried and found guilty. Violence continues to occur in the rural northeast between labor and management. The resulting insecurity hinders development of labor union activity.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is no favored or state religion. An overwhelming majority of Brazilians belong to the Roman Catholic church. All faiths are free to proselytize, establish places of worship and train clergy. According to the National Council of Brazilian Bishops (CNBB), missionaries and other foreign religious visitors have had increasing difficulty entering Brazil during the past several years due to the passage of an immigration law in 1980. The CNBB does not believe that missionaries and religious visitors are being singled out but rather that all foreigners are equally affected. Membership in a particular religion does not confer any advantage or disadvantage.

Somewhat strained relations continue between the Catholic Church and the Government, arising from the Church's political and social activism. Relations remained stable during 1984 with no reported efforts by the Government to intervene in Church programs.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no restrictions on movement within Brazil nor are there any unusual restrictions on emigration. Brazil admits few immigrants, basing its decision on its ability to absorb newcomers, cultural affinity and proximity of the applicant's homeland. Brazil is selective in granting asylum, although precise criteria do not exist. There is no forcible repatriation of Brazilians.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The focal point of political power resides in the presidency, which has been guaranteed by the armed forces. The President's constitutional powers include the right to issue decree-laws in a number of key areas and, in the event of an outbreak of war or threat of serious disturbances, to decree a state of siege which permits suspension of many civil rights.

The direct election of congressmen and senators in November 1982 produced a popularly representative Congress whose influence continues to grow in the decision-making process. Congress has been able to modify a number of government-sponsored legislative proposals and has, in some cases, forced the Government to withdraw proposals.

All Brazilian citizens may join a political party. The five currently legal parties are composed of individuals from across the entire political spectrum. The communist party is prohibited, but it is actively campaigning for legalization.

Direct voting is used to choose representatives at the federal, state and local levels, except that mayors are appointed in State capitals and in certain cities decreed to be national security areas. Voting is secret and mandatory for all literate adults, who currently make up about 75 percent of the adult population. Illiterates are not eligible to vote. The President and Vice President are chosen by an electoral college composed of the federal Congress and six representatives from each state legislature. Both candidates for the January 15, 1985 elections are civilians.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

There were no outside requests in 1984 from international human rights organizations to investigate conditions in Brazil.

There are a number of Brazilian non-governmental organizations active in investigating alleged human rights violations and in initiating legal proceedings when appropriate, such as the National Bar Association and the Brazilian Press Association. Amnesty International has offices in Rio and Sao Paulo. Collectively these groups are involved in almost all aspects of political and civil rights. There have been no claims by any of these organizations that the Government has tried to impede their investigations. Relations between these organizations and the Government tend to be closer at the state and local levels rather than the federal level. There is a consensus among human rights observers in Brazil that the human rights situation has improved dramatically over the past several years. They believe that the main problems now concern police behavior toward suspects, prison conditions, and certain economic rights. The latest Freedom House report lists Brazil as "partly free".

Brazil is party to a number of United Nations human rights conventions on genocide, racial discrimination, refugees, and the political rights of married women.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

In 1983, Brazil's gross domestic product fell by approximately 3.2 percent, the third consecutive year of economic stagnation. In 1982, the World Bank estimated GNP per capita at $2240. By 1983 it had fallen to some $1700. Inflation that year surpassed 200 percent. Unemployment rose, industrial production fell. The country was in arrears on payments of its $95 billion foreign debt. The major bright spot in the economy was a trade surplus approaching $6.5 billion in 1983.

Continued rapid expansion of exports produced the beginning of recovery in 1984. Economic growth for the year is tentatively estimated at two to four percent. However, persistent high inflation, rapid demographic growth, and the pressures of Brazil's high debt service will continue to limit improvements in living standards.

Although evidence suggests that all social strata benefited from the country's economic growth during the 1970's, uneven income distribution remains a serious social concern. According to government statistics, between 1970-80 the wealthiest 20 percent of the population increased their share of national income from 61 percent to 63 percent while the share received by the poorest 60 percent fell from 21.1 percent to 19.7 percent. Regional income differences are also marked. The south-southeast receives 82 percent of national income yet has only slightly more than 50.9 percent of the population.

Brazil continues to have a large rural-to-urban migration. Seventy percent of Brazil's approximately 134 million inhabitants live within 100 kilometers of the coast, and nearly 30 percent are concentrated in nine urban areas. The Government encourages settlement in the western frontier areas.

The Government estimates the annual population growth rate at about 2.47 percent (the World Bank estimate is 2% for the years 1980-2000). Life expectancy at birth is estimated at 65 years and infant mortality at 66 per 1000 live births. However, officials in several northeastern states estimate their infant mortality rates at well over 200, primarily due to the area's chronic poverty and sub-standard health facilities.

Health personnel and health facilities are concentrated in urban areas and the industrial southeast, which accounts for 80 percent of the physicians, 73 percent of the nursing personnel, and 79 percent of the hospital beds.

BRAZIL

Significant portions of the society lack adequate nutrition, potable water, basic education, and medical care. An estimated 23 percent of the population lacks access to safe water. Illustrative of these problems are the findings of a 1980 Brazilian congressional inquiry which indicated that Brazil has two million abandoned children and 18 to 25 million children without the basic necessities of life. In 1981, 93 percent of those eligible were enrolled in primary school. The World Bank has calculated a primary school enrollment ratio of 118. The Ministry of Education estimates that some seven million school-age children are not being reached by the educational system.

Discrimination on the basis of sex and race is illegal. Nevertheless, the number of women and members of most minority groups in the governing structure is much smaller than their proportional share of the population. Their relative under-representation reflects prevailing cultural attitudes and economic disparities.

The country's estimated 200,000 Indians, living mostly in the interior, have suffered in recent decades from gradual encroachment of Brazil's coastal population and from the Government's effort to promote economic development in frontier areas where most Indians live. The increasing contact between Indians and newcomers has caused occasional conflict. The Figueiredo administration renewed the Government's commitment under the 1973 Indian statute to protect the Indian population. In addition, the Federal Indian Affairs Agency has been demarcating tribal lands. These should provide a greater measure of security for the Indians. Nevertheless, the Indian population continues to suffer from governmental neglect, discriminatory governmental controls and unequal legal status in issues such as citizenship, voting and the right to hold office.

CHILE

Chile has been ruled since 1973 by the Army's Commanding General, President Augusto Pinochet. A military junta composed of representatives of the four military services exercises legislative functions, but primary authority resides with President Pinochet. Since independence in 1810, Chile has experienced alternating periods of authoritarian and parliamentary rule. The Junta took power in 1973 when the multi-party democratic system, in place since a previous military regime was replaced in 1931, broke down during a period of Marxist-led rule from 1970-73. The current Government includes both civilian and military officials and operates based on the authority of the Constitution approved by popular plebiscite in September 1980, which replaced the previous Constitution of 1925.

Under the September 1980 Constitution, President Pinochet's term of office expires in 1989, when a plebiscite will be held on a presidential candidate to be selected by the Junta. There are no restrictions on President Pinochet's standing for another term of office. If approved, the Junta candidate would serve until 1997. If rejected, open and direct presidential elections would be held within one year. The Constitution also provides that the Junta will serve until congressional elections are held in 1990.

The series of "National Days of Protest", begun in May 1983 by political and trade union groups calling for the removal of President Pinochet and an accelerated return to an elected civilian government, continued in 1984 on a diminished scale. There were six "National Days of Protest", often marked by violence, as well as a series of smaller demonstrations. Most democratic political parties object to the provisions of the 1980 Constitution delaying the transition to democracy and to various other provisions restricting liberties previously established in the 1925 Constitution. The Marxist-Leninist parties and groups do not accept the legitimacy of the 1980 Constitution.

While the military have indicated their intention to carry out the provisions of the 1980 Constitution, and in spite of extensive discussion and study in 1984, no progress was made in legalizing political parties, establishing electoral laws and an electoral tribunal, or in reestablishing electoral registers. Progress on the proposed legislation was set back when President Pinochet announced on October 29 that the political parties law would not be promulgated until after other political laws, at an undetermined future date.

Human rights conditions in Chile are strongly affected by the lack of progress toward a transition to democracy and by terrorism from the extreme left. The general human rights trend in Chile continued to be mixed. During early 1984, there were specific human rights improvements in judicial independence, in the return of exiles, and in freedom of speech and association. This improvement was coincident with the political opening begun in late 1983 and followed the series of national protests. As the political opening faltered and then failed, human rights conditions deteriorated, including in those areas where progress had been noted.

Parallel to the lack of progress on the political transition, a significant problem of terrorism and political violence emerged in Chile in 1984. There were 735 terrorist bombings in 1984, compared to 139 in 1983. Responsibility for most of these acts was claimed by the Manuel Rogriguez Patriotic Front (MRPF), a guerrilla organization created by the the Chilean Communist Party in 1980. The Communist Party and the MRPF seek the overthrow of the military government and were responsible for significant human rights violations in 1984, including murder.

On November 6, 1984, the Government reinstated a State of Siege under the authority of Transitory Article 41 of the 1980 Constitution. The Government explained the State of Siege as necessary to curb growing terrorism and to control delinquency and violent protestors. However, the same authority was used against non-violent political dissenters as well. The Government has maintained significant discretionary authority since 1973 under three of the four states of exception provided for under the transitory articles of the 1980 Constitution which progressively limit civil liberties otherwise provided for by the Constitution. All four may be in force concurrently; three were in force concurrently in late 1984. The "State of Danger of Disturbance of Internal Peace" (renewable every six months) was extended in March and September, and has been in force continuously since the promulgation of the Constitution in March 1981. The "State of Emergency", which had been lifted in August 1983 after ten continuous years, was reinstituted in March 1984 (renewable every 90 days) in response to the perception by the Government of a threat of violence during the opposition's March 27 "National Day of Protest". The most restrictive state of exception, the State of Assembly, has never been implemented by the Government.

Prior to the State of Siege, Government attempts to restrict individual liberties had generally been based on the provisions of the 1958 Internal Security Law, under which the courts have usually ruled in favor of the defendants, or on the transitory articles of the 1980 Constitution, which in accordance with the States of Emergency and Danger of Disturbance of Internal Peace allow extrajudicial penalties such as internal and external exile.

Measures taken by the Government under the State of Siege resulted in numerous violations of internationally recognized human rights and a general deterioration of human rights practices. Under the State of Siege, the Government increased its authority at the expense of the courts, whose rights of judicial review were restricted, and over the communications media. In addition, the existing powers of the Government, under the previously existing State of Danger of Disturbance of Internal Peace, State of Emergency and the transitory articles of the 1980 Constitution, were applied more vigorously. Using these extraordinary powers, the Government conducted several mass sweeps of poorer neighborhoods involving the temporary detention of over 8,000 persons, sent 421 persons, mainly alleged petty criminals, to a remote detention camp without trial and internally exiled another 257 persons without charges or trial, closed down or restricted the opposition media, restricted nearly all domestic political reporting, expelled two foreign priests, allegedly for political activities, censored public statements by Catholic Church leaders, as well as prohibiting several meetings planned by the Church, reimposed a late night curfew and selectively detained various political and trade union members for their political activities. Individual arrests related to politically motivated violent or non-violent activities rose substantially. Allegations of torture increased compared to 1983.

The State of Siege also undercut the political opening begun in August 1983, under which political parties, although still technically illegal or suspended, were allowed to operate in an increasingly open manner. Under the State of Siege, democratic non-Marxist parties continued functioning, albeit without media coverage, but some democratic socialist groups and non-democratic Marxist groups, including the Communist Party, were harassed and detentions occured.

Chile has an internal security apparatus composed of the National Information Center (CNI), a plain-clothes police force (Investigations), a militia-type police force (Carabineros) and military intelligence units. All are under the jurisdiction of the Ministry of Defense except the CNI, which is technically under the Ministry of Interior but is run by military officers. Most complaints concerning the security services are directed against the CNI, although the police forces have sometimes been accused of using excessive force in controlling violent demonstrations and in raids in poor neighborhoods in search of terrorists and weapons.

Labor union activity continued to be subject to the 1979 "Labor Plan," which reformulated and restored many labor rights, including collective bargaining. However, some other rights remain restricted and the right to strike in non-strategic industries continues to be limited to 60 days.

During 1984, the Government continued to allow the return of some exiles. In September, an official list of 4,860 Chileans prohibited from returning was made public together with the statement by a government spokesman that all others were free to return. Prior to publication of the list, an average of 50-100 exiles per month had been authorized to return throughout 1984 under an already established system which will continue for those on the prohibition list. Included on the prohibited list were the names of two persons expelled earlier in the year. Both returned because of a favorable court decision. When that decision was later overturned on a government appeal, the two went into hiding after their names were published among those not permitted to return. Throughout the year, various groups of exiles on the list of those prohibited reentry attempted to return to Chile. These individuals were denied entry and airlines were informed that they would be obliged to return the exiles to their point of departure at the airlines' expense.

Despite a large public sector and considerable government regulation of the economy, Chile basically follows a free market model. Chile's level of economic development places it among the most advanced of the less developed countries, and educational and health standards are good. The Government respects private property, and encourages private business. Nonetheless, the severe recession from late 1981 to mid-1983 led to an increase in government intervention in the economy, especially for ailing financial institutions. A two-year macroeconomic adjustment program, agreed upon with the International Monetary Fund in January 1983, limits the Government's economic policy options. Government efforts to stimulate the economy in 1983 led to a decline in unemployment. However, the level of unemployment equaled 14.6 percent of the work force for the three-month period ending in November 1984, the same as at the end of 1983. Over the same period, the percentage of the work force in public work programs declined from 13.2 percent to 9.7 percent. Social expenditures as a percentage of total government spending totaled 59.7 percent in 1983 with emphasis directed at the poor.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Politically motivated violence increased in Chile in 1984. A total of 58 persons were killed and 515 injured in apparently politically-related acts. The deaths and injuries resulted from actions by the Government, by left and right-wing terrorists, and by those associated with protest demonstrations and include those specified in the following paragraphs.

The death of an individual under detention by the CNI in the town of La Serena and the discovery of the body of a young worker several weeks after he was allegedly detained by Carabineros are currently under judicial investigation. Assertions have been made that several of the 14 alleged extremists killed and four wounded in shoot-outs with government security forces were actually murders of surrendered or surrendering suspects. An Army officer apparently killed himself when a bomb being planted in a church exploded prematurely.

Two government security agents were killed and eight wounded in the shoot-outs with extremists. In addition, 26 government security agents were wounded as a result of 21 separate terrorist attacks on precinct houses.

The continuation of "National Days of Protest" in 1984, as well as numerous smaller demonstrations, resulted in 24 civilians being killed and about 335 injured as a consequence of government attempts to control popular demonstrations or in associated accidents (down from 45 killed and about 400 injured in 1983). In addition, nine uniformed security agents were killed and about 45 more were injured during the protests.

In the 735 separate terrorist bombing attacks, most of which the Chilean Communist Party-linked Manuel Rodriguez Patriotic Front (MRPF) claimed to have carried out, four persons were killed and 102 injured. There is considerable evidence of Cuban, Nicaraguan, Libyan, and East European training and other support for the MRPF and the leftist terrorist group the Movement of the Revolutionary Left. The objective of both groups is the violent overthrow of the military regime and its replacement with a Marxist-Leninist regime.

One person, a Mapuche Indian leader, died under unknown circumstances in an action the rightist terrorist group Chilean Anti-Communist Action (ACHA) claims to have carried out. Human rights sources believe that ACHA is supported by and has links to Chilean government security services, particularly the CNI. Death threats from ACHA were received by numerous human rights and Indian leaders throughout Chile in 1984.

b. Disappearance

The first case of mysterious disappearance since 1978 occurred in 1984. On October 25 the body of a young Chilean worker was found in a river. The body was decapitated and missing one hand. Family members identified the body as that of an individual arrested by the Carabineros on September 4. The Catholic Church human rights organization, the Vicariate of Solidarity, has initiated civil and military court proceedings. The security services deny that the individual was arrested.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture and police brutality continue to be a serious problem in Chile. Torture by the security services, particularly the CNI, in actions related to its anti-terrorist mandate, is apparently permitted by the Government. The Chilean Medical Association is investigating cases of involvement by military doctors in torture and is preparing disciplinary action in one case.

The Constitution prohibits "use of all illegal pressure" and "guarantees to all persons the right to life and to the physical and psychic integrity of the individual." High-level government officials deny that the use of torture is authorized, but there is no evidence of specific government action to end torture. Transitory Article 24 of the Constitution permits incarceration in places other than jails, and it is in these other detention facilities where most torture is alleged to occur. In June, however, in keeping with a late 1983 court ruling, the Ministry of Justice published the addresses of ten previously secret CNI detention centers. The Government has also given itself authority for the CNI formally to arrest persons and detain them in its own facilities.

Credible reports of torture at these and possibly other detention centers of the CNI were made public by human rights sources in 1984. On October 18, one individual died, apparently as a result of torture while in CNI custody. The hospital admittance report, as well as the victim's oral testimony prior to his death, indicated that he had been subjected to electrical shocks and repeated blows to the abdomen which reportedly caused extensive internal bleeding. A habeus corpus petition was presented in favor of the man shortly after his detention. However, the petition was denied. The man was subsequently delivered by the CNI to a hospital where he died in surgery. CNI issued a statement saying the individual, a regional member of the Christian Democratic Party, was a terrorist.

In 1984, 84 persons filed complaints in courts alleging torture or cruel and unusual punishment compared with a total of 77 in 1983, 57 in 1982, 68 in 1981, and 100 in 1980. From 1976 to 1979, cases of torture declined as compared to the period 1973 - 1975. Most of these individuals allege that they were subjected to beatings, electric shocks, or threats, particularly during the first days of detention prior to arraignment. Chilean judges have recently begun ordering physical examinations for those alleging torture but no cases have completed the court process as yet. In most cases, the civilian judges have indicated that they lack jurisdiction and the cases have been referred to military courts where the military judges have either indicated an inability to identify the perpetrators or had nothing to report. While the civilian courts have named individuals they believe should have been indicted for torture if the civilian courts had jurisdiction, or, therefore, who should be indicted by the military courts, no military person has been charged or tried for torture in Chile.

Although the Government asserts that security and military forces are under strict control, a continuation of incidents of deliberate and random police brutality was reported by both Chilean and international human rights sources during 1984. Some such street incidents have been photographed and reproduced internationally on television. While most detainees do not file formal claims of mistreatment, some persons detained during the "National Days of Protest" or on other political grounds have complained of being beaten and forced to remain unclothed for extended periods of time. As a result of some of these incidents, police and military officials accused of excessive use of force were arrested. Most of those arrested have been arraigned and are currently free on bail awaiting trial.

Since January 1981, all persons officially charged with or convicted of violation of internal security laws have been lodged in the same penal facilities with other offenders. They have the rights of visitation and communications with family, friends, legal counsel, and representatives of the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC).

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Arbitrary arrests, detentions and internal exile without trial were among the most serious areas of human rights violations in 1984. Under the state of siege, more than 8,000 persons were temporarily detained in massive police round-ups. Hundreds were detained without charge and 678 were sent into internal exile (421 to the Pisagua detention camp and 257 to other remote locations). Transitory Article 24 of the 1980 Constitution provides that security officials may detain individuals for investigation for a period of up to five days and up to 20 days in cases of terrorist acts which involve death, injury, or kidnapping before bringing them to a court. During the initial period of investigation, prisoners are often held incommunicado. In those cases reaching the courts, the investigating judges may take up to five more days to deliberate. These time limits are enforced and all defendants are allowed a lawyer of their own choosing. Lawyers affiliated with human rights groups are readily available without charge if necessary. Some of those arrested are charged with common crimes, such as illegal possession of weapons, robbery or murder. In other instances, the arrests appear clearly related to expression of the individual's political views or to alleged seditious activity, although the Government denies that anyone is arrested or detained because of his or her political views.

Although Chilean law specifically states that search and/or arrest warrants must be obtained from the courts and shown to the accused before implementation, a right guaranteed by the 1980 Constitution, this right is undercut by the Executive Powers granted under Transitory Article 24. In 1984, the CNI continued to obtain broadly-worded warrants which gave it considerable latitude in making searches or arrests. In most cases during the State of Siege, no warrants were shown by security officers. However, the courts have become firmer in demanding prompt accounts from the Government of those arrested by the CNI, including during the State of Siege. While writs of habeas corpus can be and are accepted during the initial arrest period, judges traditionally have been required only to verify the legal authority under which the person was detained. On November 12, the Supreme Court ordered all judges to begin insisting on the physical presence of the detainee in the courtroom, but it is not yet clear whether the Government will abide by the Court's order. When individuals are detained for activities related to politics, friends or relatives normally report the detentions, the press publicizes them, and the Government subsequently acknowledges them, although press restrictions during the State of Siege have made this process less effective.

The Catholic Church human rights organization, the Vicariate of Solidarity, reported handling directly a total of 5,264 detentions for security reasons during 1984, including 2,446 individual and 2,818 persons arrested in groups. (The comparative figures for 1983 were 4,537 total arrests, of which 735 were individual arrests and 3,802 persons arrested in groups.) In 1984, as in previous years, only about one percent of those initially arrested were convicted of a serious crime, nearly two percent were internally or externally exiled by administrative decree, another 40 percent paid small fines in a municipal court (averaging less than ten dollars per person) for disorderly behaviour, about nine percent were declared innocent following a public trial, about 13 percent were released by investigating judges for lack of sufficient evidence and slightly over 35 percent were released by the Government within five days without any charges being pressed.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Actions taken under the State of Siege resulted in serious violations of the right to a fair public trial. Respect for individual rights and civil liberties are guaranteed by the 1980 Constitution, but they are restricted to varying degrees by constitutionally sanctioned emergency powers. In 1984, the Chilean Government used its extraordinary powers under Transitory Article 24 effectively to nullify due process of law in several instances. Special laws were created or administrative decrees issued to thwart or reverse decisions by the court system.

As part of a general trend towards greater judicial independence, the courts have struck down some of these new laws and some lower courts even challenged Executive actions sanctioned by the transitory articles of the Constitution. This trend suffered a setback in July when the Supreme Court held that the President had "exclusive" power under authority granted in Transitory Article 24 to declare a "State of Danger of Disturbance of Internal Peace" and that "all means of judicial appeal (of executive actions authorized by that article) were suspended," leaving only the possibility of appeal to the President. However, as arrests and detentions continued under the State of Siege, a conflict emerged between the Executive and Judicial Branches of Government. The Judicial Branch is insisting that the courts have jurisdiction over those detained and can order inspections and process writs of habeus corpus under Article 21 of the Constitution. The Executive Branch insists that the Executive has the right to detain persons, per Article 41, which outlines procedures for the State of Siege. The Supreme Court has issued instructions to all Municipal Court officials outlining their responsibilities under the State of Siege. It is not clear whether the Government will comply with the Court's instructions.

Chile's civilian judges are career officials and most served in the judiciary before the present Government took power in 1973. First instance jurisdiction for the prosecution of proscribed political activities lies with regular civilian courts. As is common in Latin America, there is no trial by jury, and reliance is on the written record, rather than oral testimony. A judge serves multiple functions: as prosecutor, sometimes as defense attorney, and finally as the one who decides innocence or guilt. There is a well-developed multi-stage appeal process leading ultimately to the Supreme Court. Defendants' full legal rights to due process of law, including the right to legal counsel of their choice, have been limited by the State of Siege. In 1983 and 1984, there were fewer accusations than in past years that judges failed to assert their independence from the Government.

Weapons violations, which often are the basis of charges against alleged subversives, are tried before a military court. Appeals may be made to a military court of two civilian judges and three professional military judges and, in the last resort, to the entirely civilian Supreme Court. A 1981 decree granting juridiction over attacks on government personnel to a military tribunal--in which defendants' rights are limited--was invoked once in 1981, not at all in 1982, and in 1983 only for the accused assassins of the Santiago military intendant (governor) and his two army bodyguards. The decree was not invoked in 1984, except for the continuation of a 1983 case, whose constitutional legality is currently under appeal to the Supreme Court.

At the end of 1984, the Vicariate of Solidarity reported that 274 persons were imprisoned in Chile for politically motivated acts, some of which were violent; 227 were in jail awaiting trial and 34 were serving sentences after convictions. Additionally, 524 were free on bail while awaiting trial, 5 had been judicially sent into internal exile, 8 externally exiled by judicial decisions, 86 were free on parole and 8 were fugitives. In addition, 766 persons were internally exiled during the year for up to three months by administrative orders not subject to judicial reviews, compared to 98 in 1983. Most were sent to distant villages as punishment for illegal political activities or because they were regarded as habitual criminals. Eight persons were expelled from Chile in 1984 under Transitory Article 24 of the 1980 Constitution compared to no cases in 1983 and two cases in 1982. There have been no charges of forced labor in Chile since the mid-1970s.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home or Correspondence

Searches of the home and interception of private verbal or written communications are permitted by the 1980 Constitution provided that search warrants are issued by either a civilian or military court for specific locations. Wiretapping is also permitted subject to issuance of a judicial order. The new anti-terrorist law published May 17, 1984, in Articles 9 and 14, provides legal authority for surveillance of those advocating political views contrary to the 1980 Constitution and for interception, opening or recording of private communications and documents as well as the surveillance of individuals suspected of the commission of terrorist crimes. There are allegations that security forces do not always comply with the legal requirements for search warrants or judicial orders. In addition, searches of homes continue to be carried out under general warrants issued by civilian or military courts. Human rights organizations report that in a number of searches, legal requirements, such as display of a warrant, were not observed. This was particularly true in the search-and-detain operations carried out in four poor Santiago neighborhoods during November under the State of Siege where extensive property damage was also reported.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The 1980 Constitution guarantees freedom of expression and of the press. While freedom of speech is the norm in private conversations in Chile, various human rights groups indicate that extensive monitoring of mail and telephonic communications is conducted by government security services, particularly CNI. There are no constitutional provisions for official censorship. However, the Government exercises control of the media under the authority of Transitory Article 24 of the Constitution and the three states of exception concurrently in force (State of Danger of Disturbance of Internal Peace, State of Emergency and State of Siege). In addition, since 1973, the Government, usually through informal channels, has advised print, radio and television editors when their coverage was considered too critical of the Government. To forestall such notification, self-censorship is practiced by the electronic media and dailies with most editors adopting a cautious approach in the formulation of commentary. Several major media companies are in debt to government financial institutions, possibly resulting in further constraints on freedom of expression.

The Government, after relaxing controls on the media in 1983, in 1984 reestablished and enlarged restrictions on freedom of the press. Steps were taken through the civil and military courts, through a series of special administrative measures made possible by the powers granted the Government during the "State of Emergency" declared on March 21, and by rewriting the laws on libel and defamation of character. Multiple, overlapping edicts were issued banning photos, placement of news, types of news, specific coverage, and specific topics. Several journalists were arrested. While the courts threw out most of the edicts as unconstitutional, the Government achieved its short-term objective of blocking specific issues or news and, in several instances, simply issued another edict once the others were ruled out by the courts, in effect neutralizing the courts and blocking due process.

On March 26, in anticipation of widespread disruptions during the protests scheduled for March 27, the Government published two edicts. The first directed the media to refrain from publishing any material which encouraged "any alteration of the public order." The second edict directed four opposition magazines to submit their copy for prior censorship. This second edict was withdrawn four days later, though not before all the publications so directed had filed protests in the civil courts.

In April, the Government attempted to impose selective prior censorship for the second time and also filed charges against an opposition magazine and its editor for violating the State Security Law of 1958. These charges were dismissed by the courts which also ruled against the Government in disallowing prior censorship. On May 17, following publication of articles charging financial corruption by President Pinochet, members of his family and aides, the Government published a new version of the existing libel law. Called the "Law on Publicity Abuses," the rewritten statute significantly increased potential penalties for publishing false information about an individual's public affairs and made publication of any material, true or false, about an individual's private life or those of his spouse, descendents, forebearers, or siblings an actionable offense. An individual involved in bringing the charges against President Pinochet was beaten by unknown assailants and documents relating to the corruption charges were taken.

On September 3, one day before a scheduled national protest, the Government initiated court actions against several opposition magazines and ordered one of them to suspend publication for five issues. This suspension was subsequently lifted by the Appeals Court, but the objective of blocking publication was achieved in the interim. On September 4, the Government banned news broadcasting by four opposition radio stations. The bans were lifted a few days later, but not until the protests were over, thus achieving the objective of censoring the news without having the courts again declare the restriction illegal. On September 9, the Government published "Edict 19," which prohibited certain opposition magazines from publishing graphics of any kind and limited them to publishing information about protest demonstrations on their inside pages. The graphics prohibition was overturned by an Appellate Court on October 26, but the ban on front page coverage of protests was upheld. The Government has since appealed the court's decision on the publication of graphics.

Under the State of Siege declared by the Government on November 6, such control of the media has been greatly expanded to include prohibitions against media coverage of terrorist acts and all domestic political events and declarations except those provided by official government sources, though this latter restriction is not uniformly enforced. In addition, five opposition periodicals have been suspended from publication and a sixth is required to submit its copy to government censors prior to publication.

Cases involving most of the opposition press continue to be adjudicated. A number of these cases have been brought by various offices of the Government, but a significant number have also been initiated by the press. Over the year, the courts have maintained their independence vis-a-vis the Government on the issue of freedom of expression and, in a series of important cases, ruled in favor of opposition publications.

Individuals distributing publications considered subversive are subject to arrest and prosecution. All motion picture films must obtain approval from a censorship board and some are not permitted to enter Chile. The Government owns one newspaper, one radio network and the only truly nationwide television network. Access to this network is strictly controlled and opposition views are not given coverage. All other media firms - the majority - are privately owned. The Government does not jam foreign radio broadcasts. The distribution of foreign publications has rarely been delayed, although some foreign publications have been banned.

Under the State of Siege, the foreign press in Chile has come under increased government scrutiny with reports of incidents of confiscation of press notebooks and films at demonstrations, government monitoring of foreign correspondents' dispatches abroad, the November 26 government cancellation and review before reissuance of credentials to foreign press, and the expulsion from the country of the resident UPI correspondent on November 29. He was later allowed to return to the country in exchange for the departure of another UPI employee. Prior to the State of Siege, the foreign press generally operated free from government interference.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Significant violations of freedom of peaceful assembly and association continued to occur in 1984. Restrictions on freedom of assembly, which were lifted when the State of Emergency was ended in August 1983, were reinstituted when the State of Emergency was restored in March 1984. On October 27, 1983 the Government had passed special legislation placing responsibility for protest demonstrations on certain individuals, and thus seeking to discourage further protests. Under this law, leaders of the two main opposition movements were arrested on October 9, 1984 on charges of encouraging the September 4-5, 1984 protest demonstration. The charges were dropped the next day at the request of President Pinochet. Other administrative measures were taken against workers and trade unionists in an effort to stop a planned national strike on October 29-30. With the declaration of the State of Siege on November 6, 1984 all political and labor assemblies have been required to give five days advance notice to the authorities. Five days notice must be given, as well as receiving government authorization, for special events, although those who peacefully protested the State of Siege in Santiago on November 27-28 were not arrested when the unauthorized demonstration was dispersed by the Carabineros.

Individual labor leaders have sometimes been dismissed under circumstances suggesting that they lost their jobs because of criticism of management or of the Government. The State of Siege has not interfered with most trade union activities. Collective bargaining, strikes, and internal union elections can go on as before. However, trade unions, as with other legally constituted groups, must obtain permission five days in advance to hold meetings. Some trade unions have had their premises searched, and several Communist Party labor leaders have been internally exiled.

Many trade union rights, suspended after the military takeover in 1973, were reinstated in July 1979, by a series of decree-laws known as the "Labor Plan." The trade union movement had little effective participation in the formulation of the Labor Plan and little influence in the Government's decisions regarding implementation of the new Labor Code. In 1983, opposition labor organizations, which enjoyed legal status, were given the opportunity to participate in a study of possible revisions of the Labor Plan. The vast majority of these organizations chose not to join, mainly because they objected to the original Labor Plan which would remain the basis for any revisions. The study was completed, and proposed modifications were submitted to the Junta in early 1984. The Junta reportedly continues to study the revisions.

Under the Labor Plan, workers at units employing 25 or more individuals can form a union by majority vote and elect their officers from among their co-workers. Officers of trade union organizations (including federations and confederations) must continue to be employed in their jobs in a plant represented by their union but are legally entitled to specified paid time off for their union work. Trade union leaders have three specific objections to the Labor Plan. First, collective bargaining is permitted at the plant level only. Second, national confederations embracing more than one industry as well as unions at the local level embracing more than one employer have no legal standing, although de facto nationwide confederations exist and their leaders sometimes meet with government officials. Federations and confederations are limited generally by law to providing technical assistance, education programs, and welfare and benefits activities for their affiliates. In fact, many are active politically, often in opposition to the Government. Third, the right to strike, legal only during collective bargaining negotiations, is limited to 60 days, after which workers may be considered by their employers to have voluntarily resigned their jobs. The right to strike is prohibited in designated strategic industries. In 1984, 48 firms, mostly public utilities, government copper mines, and the petroleum industry, were so listed. For these companies, failure to reach agreement during negotiations leads to binding arbitration. Management is legally permitted to hire strikebreakers in all instances.

In 1981, labor courts were incorporated into the normal juridical system. However, the Minister of Justice has declared the Government's intention to establish a labor court system, following complaints from labor and management that the present system is not working well.

The civil service is allowed to form associations but not unions. It does not have the right to bargain collectively or to strike. The Dockworkers' National Union, as previously constituted, and the union card, which severely restricted access to port jobs, were eliminated in 1982. The National Dockworkers' Union was replaced by small independent unions established in individual private companies which contract ship handling services. Professional groups and associations have not been limited by recent decree laws which were aimed at eliminating closed shop-type compulsory licensing privileges.

Labor unions are permitted to maintain relations with non-Marxist international labor bodies in their fields. In 1984, the International Labor Organization (ILO) conference accepted the credentials of the Chilean worker delegates which were challenged by the Christian Democratic-oriented International Confederation of Labor (WCL) and the communist-controlled World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU) on behalf of opposition labor groups in Chile. The Credentials Committee did, however, urge the Government in the future to consult with all the most representative organizations without exception. In recent years these two labor internationals and the democratic-oriented International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) have been active in bringing complaints in the ILO against the Government, alleging violation of several conventions concerning freedom of association, employment, forced labor, and unemployment policies. Chile was the subject of a critical, special paragraph in the 1983 report of the ILO's Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations. The committee observed that national legislation and practice were not in conformity with the Commission on Discrimination in Employment and Occupation. In its 1984 report, however, the committee noted that positive developments had taken place, in particular that an advisory mission had permitted detailed discussion of the points raised by the ILO and that new legislation was being envisaged to meet these comments.

Organized labor continued to press for a full investigation of the 1982 murder of labor leader Tucapel Jimenez, who had tried to establish a national union. In late 1983, lawyers for the Jimenez family reported that they had completed their investigation of the case and had submitted evidence obtained from a former CNI employee to the courts, where it is currently under consideration. The evidence reportedly implicates persons associated with the CNI in the murder. There were no developments in this case in 1984.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Constitution guarantees absolute freedom of religion. Although a predominantly Roman Catholic country, there are no restrictions on freedom of religion and no official discrimination practiced against any religious group. A number of Protestant denominations and other groups are active and report full freedom and tolerance, as does the Jewish community. Religious belief and adherence appear to have no effect on acceptability for government positions in Chile.

On November 10, 1984 the Government prohibited media coverage of a pastoral statement by the Archbishop of Santiago concerning the mass police sweeps made in areas of Santiago, though it did not interfere with the Church's publication and distribution of the statement. Other steps were taken throughout the country to limit expression by the Catholic Church, including television censorship of remarks by a Church spokesperson on November 12, and cancellation on November 14 of the Catholic Church's thirteenth annual social week devoted to consideration of a peaceful transition to democracy in Chile. On November 18, the Archbishop of Santiago issued a pastoral letter critical of the Government for censorship of the Church and for human rights violations.

On November 11, the Government issued a decree forbidding the return to Chile of a Spanish national priest who was the head of the Church's human rights organization, the Vicariate of Solidarity. A French national priest was apparently accidently shot in his residence during the September 4 demonstration and on December 5 a Carabinero officer was charged by the courts with the death. On December 27, a U.S.

national priest was expelled from Chile for activities related to an anti-torture campaign.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Chileans have full constitutional freedom to move about within or to leave their country, although the State of Siege gives the President the power to restrict movement on an individual basis, a power as yet unused. As many as one million Chileans live abroad, principally for economic reasons. Most of them have resided for many years in Argentina. In the judgment of international organizations dealing with migrants, the volume of skilled and unskilled workers returning to Chile now roughly equals the number leaving. Most of the current emigrants seem to be motivated by economic rather than political factors, and no impediments have been placed in the way of their return. There have been no complaints concerning the treatment of either political or economic repatriates.

Following the military takeover in 1973, thousands of persons left Chile. Later, many were forbidden to return by administrative decrees, although the exact number was in dispute. After initially publishing lists of those persons permitted to return, in September 1984, after years of controversy, the Government made public a list of 4,860 Chileans in exile who would not be allowed to return, thereby resolving the question of who was exiled and who was considered to have left voluntarily. A government spokesperson stated that all those not on the list are permitted to return. For those on the list, the Government continued its already established system of requiring individual exiles to apply at Chilean missions abroad for approval to return. (An average of 50-100 a month were authorized to return during 1984.) It is not known how many persons have actually returned or how many have petitioned Chilean missions abroad for the right to return.

Chile has accepted a few refugees from other countries in recent years and makes regular, modest financial contributions to international organizations aiding refugees.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

In 1984 there were six "National Days of Protest" against the military Government's announced intention, pursuant to the 1980 Constitution, to remain in power at least until the plebiscite of 1989, and in favor of a return to an elected civilian government. Democratic opposition groups, organized in a coalition known as the Democratic Alliance, have called for an early return to democracy and on December 14 sent a letter to the members of the Junta proposing the basis for a discussion of the transition process. At issue is the legitimacy of the 1980 Constitution and the transition schedule established in that document. In the September 1980 plebiscite, which approved the new Constitution by a two-thirds majority, there was universal suffrage and voting was required by law. While most observers believed that the results of the plebiscite reflected the will of the majority, opposition elements criticized the lack of choice for an alternative constitution, as well as the absence of electoral registers and other safeguards and restraints on the ability to publicize fully objections to the proposed Constitution.

CHILE

According to the Constitution, a plebiscite will be held in 1989 to accept or reject a Junta-approved candidate for President. If approved, he will serve until 1997; if rejected, there will be open presidential elections in 1990. Congressional elections are also scheduled for 1990. Prior to the State of Siege, government spokespersons indicated some willingness to consider a plebiscite to change the Constitution to advance the date for congressional elections and President Pinochet submitted a proposal to the Junta in March suggesting that a plebiscite be held on whether or not to grant the Executive authority to hold consultative plebiscites at will. The proposal is still under study by the Junta. However, according to the Constitution, which was approved in voting based on identity cards, any plebiscite to change the Constitution can be held only after publication of a new electoral law. If the plebiscite approves changes in the Constitution to advance the date for congressional elections, such elections would then be set for a subsequent date. Government spokespersons have officially indicated that such elections would also require reestablishment of electoral registers which were destroyed in 1974 because of falsifications that had taken place during the Allende Government. Meanwhile, the Junta exercises legislative authority, subject to presidential approval.

Prior to the State of Siege, President Pinochet had committed himself to issuance of a law legalizing political parties. Significant differences emerged between the President and the Junta over the terms of the new political parties law, specifically with regard to the formation of regional political parties and the required number of signatures to form a national party. In view of the unresolved issues, and making reference to the ongoing protests and increasing terrorism, President Pinochet on October 29 declared that the political parties law would not be published until after an electoral tribunal law and electoral law were passed, but set no date for doing so. Technically, the Junta is still considering the political parties law. The draft, which is largely in the public domain, has been denounced as undemocratic by several opposition political parties which refused to participate in the drafting process despite being invited by the Government to do so, since, in their view, such participation would imply acceptance of the 1980 Constitution. The law on electoral tribunals is also still before the Junta. In addition, a Government-appointed body, the Council of State, is studying proposals for electoral laws.

Political parties, including those with a Marxist orientation, were allowed to function in an increasingly open manner after the relaxation of political restrictions in August 1983 until the declaration of the State of Siege on November 6, 1984. All parties remain formally "recessed" by the Government and Marxist parties that were members of the 1970-73 Government remain illegal. Democratic parties have been allowed to continue functioning under the State of Siege, albeit under duress and without publicity. Marxist parties have been harassed into the quasi-clandestine status that prevailed before the August 1983 political opening.

University students increased substantially their political activity in 1984, despite a 1981 law forbidding nearly all political activity in the country's state-supported universities. In direct elections, opposition university student groups won control of a number of student federations, including that at the University of Chile. Student pressures for reduced government interference in universities continue. Student demonstrations, often involving takeovers and violence, have occurred on a number of campuses and authorities have sometimes called in the Carabineros to restore order. Nearly two hundred students have been expelled from various campuses in Chile as a result of the demonstrations.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-government Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights.

In July 1978, the Government allowed members of an ad hoc working group of the United Nations Human Rights Commission (UNHRC) to visit Chile. After the group completed its work, a Special Rapporteur was appointed to submit human rights reports on Chile to the Commission and to the United Nations General Assembly. The Government has informed U.N. authorities yearly since 1979 that it will not cooperate with UNHRC's Special Rapporteur, contending that the special status given to Chile "has no legal or moral validity and is unjustifiable discrimination against Chile," a position supported in recent years by the U.S. The Government has also refused to cooperate with the Inter-American Human Rights Commission and has denied permission for the Commission to enter Chile. However, government policy has generally been to allow visits and investigations by private international human rights groups. In 1982, Amnesty International visited and in more recent years there have been numerous visits by less well-known international human rights groups, as well as visits by individual representatives of such groups. In addition, in 1978 and 1980, the Government allowed visits by a mission from the International Labor Organization (ILO) to check on alleged abuses of trade union rights, particularly freedom of association. While the allegations remain pending, ILO reports specifically noted the cooperation of the Chilean Government in the investigations.

Since the 1973 military takeover, the Inter-Government Committee for Migration (ICM) has been active in Chile, conducting a program giving prisoners convicted of politically related offenses an opportunity to go into exile rather than remain in prison. In recent years, the ICM has been involved in helping some migrants, mainly economic ones, to return.

The Lawyer's Committee for International Human Rights and other non-governmental organizations have expressed special concern about Chile. Amnesty International, in its 1984 report, expressed concern over the complaints of torture and other mistreatment of detainees by security forces, the arbitrary detention of thousands of demonstrators, the banishment without trial of 127 persons, the imprisonment of prisoners of conscience, the death of political opponents of the Government in disturbing circumstances, the continuing enforcement of emergency legislation affecting the right to due process of law, and the failure to account for those 663 persons who disappeared in the period 1973-78. Although the Government contends that virtually all of the reports produced by these foreign organizations exaggerate or deliberately distort the scope and volume of abuses, it has permitted visits by their representatives. International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) representatives also regularly visit Chile to check on prison conditions. Freedom House, in its 1984 report, gave a "partly free" rating to Chile.

The Catholic Church since 1973 has taken the lead in defending human rights and supplying legal counsel to those accused of politically related crimes and to alleged victims of human rights abuses. The Church's human rights group, the Vicariate of Solidarity, monitors the human rights situation from church offices throughout Chile, issues monthly reports, and has protected and defended significant numbers of people since 1973. The Church's activities have resulted in visible tensions between the Government and the Church hierarchy, and official action was taken in 1984 to prohibit the re-entry into Chile of the head of the organization, a Spanish national priest. Some church activists and human rights lawyers have occasionally been threatened anonymously.

The Chilean Commission for Human Rights, a private organization, has also publicized alleged abuses and spoken out strongly against them, as well as issuing monthly reports on the human rights situation. It has been allowed to maintain affiliations with international human rights groups. During the State of Siege, a number of the Commission's members were subjected to arrest and sent into internal exile, allegedly for their political activities.

The Vicariate of Solidarity, despite having some active political figures, including Marxists, on its staff, maintains a posture of being concerned only with human rights and publicly offers no specifically political opinions. The Chilean Commission for Human Rights, directed by opposition political figures, openly devotes its efforts not only to human rights issues but also to bringing about major changes in the nature of the government as the best means of ending human rights abuses.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Chile suffered a severe recession in 1982 and as a consequence, agreed to a two-year standby program with the IMF in January 1983 to provide essential support for balance of payments purposes and orderly external debt servicing. At the same time, the program limited the Government's ability further to stimulate the economy, and to counteract the social effects of the recession.

Large fiscal expenditures, plus some recovery in private sector activity, led to a real GDP increase of 5.9 percent in 1984, although the rate declined in the last half of the year. Inflation grew by 23 percent in 1984 and real wages declined by 5.6 percent through October. Unemployment remained at 14.6 percent through November, the same as at the end of 1983. However, the percentage of the work force in low-wage government emergency work programs equaled 9.7 percent at the end of November, down from 13.2 percent at the end of 1983. Austerity measures, including a devaluation and an increase in import duties, were announced on September 17, 1984.

In 1983, 59.7 percent of all central budget expenditures went to social services, with health expenditures declining to 8.6 percent of the social services subtotal, social welfare expenditures increasing to 28.6 percent, housing increasing to 2.2 percent, pension and unemployment support increasing slightly to 33.3 percent, and education declining to 26.3 percent. The Government focuses its social programs on the poor. The number of Chileans living below the absolute poverty level exceeds 15 percent of the population. Health and nutrition programs in Chile are extensive, despite some recession-induced cuts in 1983 spending. The level of malnutrition in children under six years of age increased slightly to 9.0 percent in 1983. Infant mortality rates declined to 20 per 1,000 live births in 1983. Average life expectancy at birth increased to 67.8 years in 1983. In 1977, the Chilean calorie supply as a percentage of nutritional requirements was 108.9 percent. In 1979, 87.0 percent of the population had access to safe water. The Government devoted 15.7 percent of its central budget to education in 1983. The primary school enrollment ratio was 119 percent in 1979 (indicating some primary enrollment by older students) and the adult literacy rate increased to 94.4 percent in 1983.

The population's economic and social needs, while still very high among the poorer sectors, are largely met on a non-discriminatory basis. Nonetheless, some legal distinctions between the sexes still exist. For example, the legal retirement age for women is five years lower than that for men. Married women may not conduct commercial transactions unless a separation of goods contract is established at the time of marriage, or through a subsequent special one-time request. Married women may not take children out of the country without the permission of the father. On the other hand, inheritance laws provide strong protection for wives and favor female heirs over male heirs. Abortion is illegal, but birth control information and devices are readily available in private channels and through many government health clinics. Women's status in society has evolved positively over the years, and women now enjoy greater access to education and employment than in the past. In 1981, the primary school enrollment ratios for females and males were about the same. In 1970, female literacy equaled 88.2 percent, compared with 89.9 percent for males. In 1982, 39.4 percent of all university students were women. Women have served in such important government positions as mayors, agency heads and ministers.

Women have good access to entry-level and mid-level professional jobs, but they do not hold a proportional number of upper-level positions.

Minority groups do not suffer any specific legal discriminations. The only significant minority group, the Mapuche Indians from the southern region of Chile, remains partly separate from the rest of the society due to historical, cultural, educational, and geographic factors rather than official policy. Government efforts to integrate this group through, among other things, division of communal lands into individual land holdings, led to several violent demonstrations. Problems were encountered by the leaders of a Mapuche organization throughout 1984. On April 25 twelve Mapuche's were arrested and two were reportedly beaten. Two were internally exiled to small towns in the north of Chile for 90 days each. During the State of Siege many of these individuals were again arrested and four were ordered into internal exile.

COLOMBIA

Colombia is a strong, functioning two-party democracy, ruled by elected governments for all but four years (1953-57) of the present century. The political arena has been dominated by the Liberal and Conservative parties since the mid-19th century, but smaller parties are nominally represented in Congress and have fielded Presidential candidates. Members of Congress and the President are elected in separate elections every four years. In the 1982 elections, which produced the largest voter turnout in recent history, Belisario Betancur, the Conservative candidate, won the Presidency while the Liberals took control of Congress. Governors, mayors, and members of the Cabinet are appointed by the President under a constitutional provision which calls for "adequate and equitable" representation in government of members of the major party which does not hold the Presidency.

Civil and political liberties are guaranteed by the Constitution, but an overburdened and cumbersome judicial system more often than not results in lengthy pretrial detention. For much of the past 35 years, the country has been under a constitutionally authorized state of siege to deal with civil disturbances and insurgent movements. The state of siege, permitting curtailment of some civil and political freedoms, was lifted in 1982 but reimposed in March 1984 in the Departments of Huila, Meta, Cauca and Caqueta following a major guerrilla attack on Florencia, the capital of Caqueta Department. As a result of the assassination of the Minister of Justice on April 30, it was expanded nationwide on May 1. On declaring both the partial and nationwide states of siege, the President emphasized their limited applicability and temporary nature.

Political violence stemming from historical Conservative-Liberal struggles has troubled Colombia since the 1950's. A number of guerrilla organizations exist today. In an effort to end insurgent violence, the Government promulgated an amnesty law in November 1982 which covered all guerrillas. A reported 1,500 guerrillas took advantage of the amnesty, including 331 released from prison. There have been polarized and emotional reactions to the amnesty. Critics cited the example of a guerrilla leader released from prison who rejoined the guerrillas, while supporters pointed to an ex-guerrilla leader now in local government. The Permanent Committee for the Defense of Human Rights, the most prominent human rights organization in Colombia, reported that a total of 59 amnestied guerrillas had been killed as of August 1984. Vigilante-type groups, such as the Muerte a Secuestradores (MAS), Death to Kidnappers, has been blamed for the violence against amnestied guerrillas.

A cease-fire agreement with Colombia's largest guerrilla group, the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC), was signed March 28, 1984 and, after President Betancur endorsed it, became effective May 28. The President designated a 43-member National Verification Commission to supervise the accord.

On July 18 the President named a 35-member Negotiation and Dialogue Commission to facilitate peace talks with the M-19, the Popular Liberation Army (EPL) and the Workers' Self-Defense Movement (ADO), which led to three additional cease-fire agreements effective August 30. These plus the FARC cease-fire agreements cover an estimated 90 percent of the active guerrillas in Colombia. Only the National Liberation Army (ELN) and a few small groups had not signed such accords by the end of 1984.

The accords call for the convocation of a National Dialogue to consider basic governmental and economic reforms. The National Dialogue between the Government and representatives of the ADO, EPL, FARC, and M-19 began November 1. The cease-fire agreements have no fixed duration, but on December 1 the Government and FARC signed a formal one-year truce agreement.

The guerrilla groups that have signed cease-fire or truce agreements have retained their weapons but have promised not to use them unless unduly provoked, and they have promised to refrain from kidnapping and extortion. However, by most accounts the level of kidnappings and extortions has increased. Although clashes between the military/police and the guerrillas have fallen off, they have not yet been eliminated.

During 1984 the general human rights situation in Colombia showed continued improvement. However, Colombia continues to have a high violent-death rate. Responsibility for such violent acts is difficult to assign. Uniforms, symbols, and methods of operation are appropriated by one group or the other--the guerrillas, the armed forces, or vigilante groups--either to discredit opponents or to hide culpability, making it difficult to determine who is responsible for which crime. Criminal elements, especially those connected to drug trafficking, are responsible for many of the deaths.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

According to the Permanent Committee for the Defense of Human Rights, during the period August 1983 - August 1984, 633 people were assassinated by the armed forces, police, secret agents, paramilitary groups, or unknown persons. The Committee also listed 274 death threats and 133 woundings and attempted assassinations by security forces and paramilitary organizations. The great majority of these offenses took place in rural areas, for example, the mid-Magdalena River Valley, where the military was fighting guerrilla groups and where confirmation of reports is often difficult. The Committee's statistics are based on press reports, personal testimony, and complaints filed by relatives and friends of the victims. The Committee does little investigation of the merit of each alleged violation reported.

During the period January-August 1984, according to armed forces statistics, 67 members of the national police and 57 members of the armed forces were killed by guerrillas, while 431 guerrillas died. During the same period, 278 civilians were reported to have been assassinated by guerrillas, primarily the FARC, for failure to support the guerrillas or for presumed assistance to the security forces.

COLOMBIA

b. Disappearance

The Permanent Committee reported that 94 people had disappeared or had been kidnapped in the period January-July 1984. Twenty-eight of these offenses were attributed to security forces, 48 to paramilitary organizations, and the remaining 18 to persons unknown.

A report released by the Attorney General on October 20 stated that 150 persons disappeared between September 1977 and October 1984. It attributes some of the disappearances to military and security forces personnel, but stresses that such crimes were carried out by soldiers and policemen acting on their own, which in no way compromises the military or police institutions. The report also attributes disappearances to both paramilitary and guerrilla forces and asserts that the Government is doing its best to restrain all three sources of disappearances. None of the military personnel named in a 1983 report by the Attorney General as having been involved in vigilante-type activity has been brought to trial.

There was a rash of kidnapping in rural areas in 1984, primarily of cattlemen and large landowners. Large ransoms were demanded and, in most cases, paid. In many cases, the ransomed victims believed they were held by guerrilla groups because of the organizational skill, weapons, and ideological rhetoric used during the kidnapping and the negotiations to release them; guerrillas have traditionally used kidnapping and extortion to raise funds. In other cases, criminals motivated by purely financial gain are believed to have been responsible.

According to press reports, kidnapping reached a new high in 1984. Of 215 reported incidents, 132 were attributed to guerrillas and 83 to common criminals. Nine victims were killed, 66 remained in the hands of captors at year's end, and the remainder escaped or were rescued or ransomed.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture is forbidden by law. However, the Permanent Committee for the Defense of Human Rights listed 275 cases of torture between August 1983 and August 1984; 158 were attributed to the security forces, 72 to paramilitary organizations, and the remainder to persons unknown. Most of the cases are reported from rural areas. Press reports indicate many murder victims of vigilante groups showed signs of torture. It is impossible to determine in fact how extensive these acts are and how many, if any, are perpetrated by persons linked to the Government.

Many prisons are overcrowded, and one--on the Pacific island of Gorgona--is being closed because of its deteriorating condition. Conditions in many prisons are poor. In most, inmates are fed a subsistence diet but can supplement it with purchases from prison stores. Prisoners with financial resources live better than those without. Family members and friends are normally allowed to visit regularly and to bring food and clothes. Consular officers are given regular access to foreign prisoners. Most prisoners accused of crimes in connection with guerrilla activities have been incarcerated in regular prisons, although segregated from common criminals.

COLOMBIA

In June 1983 the International Labor Organization Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations observed that despite the explanations of the Colombian Government, certain legal provisions made it possible to impose forced labor on detained persons who had not been convicted. It tooknote, though, of the Government's intention to reform the prison code and bring it into conformity with ILO Convention 29 on forced labor.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Colombia's Constitution provides for habeas corpus procedures, and the law requires that individuals be brought to court within 72 hours of arrest in most cases. These requirements are respected in practice. Persons detained for disturbance of public order can be held up to 10 days before charges need to be filed. There are no legal provisions for exile.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The rights of public trial and due process are guaranteed to all by the Constitution. A prisoner may be represented by an attorney of his choice, or if he has none, the court will appoint one. The overburdened judicial system, however, has meant most persons indicted for common crimes never come to trial, but are simply released after serving the minimum sentence applicable to the crime in question. According to the Minister of Justice, in January 1984 there were approximately 25,000 prisoners, 17,000 of whom were in pretrial detention. A bill has recently passed Congress authorizing special judges to hear cases of extortion, kidnapping, and terrorism, as well as to reduce the number of trials by expanding the jurisdiction of police inspectors to try less serious crimes. At the same time, the Justice Ministry is considering plans to streamline the court system and revise the penal code.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution requires a court order before authorities can enter a private home, except in the case of "hot pursuit" of a person seen committing a crime. While some human rights organizations allege widespread violations in remote areas of the country, the concept of the sanctity of the home and privacy is widely respected in most parts of the country. Persons from rural areas have claimed that they were forced to leave their farms because of guerrilla activity.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

These constitutionally-guaranteed rights are as a rule respected, and the press often vigorously criticizes the Government and its leaders. The privately-owned print media are under no government restraints, publishing a wide variety of political views.

Television channels are controlled by the state, which leases time to private companies. The Government does not permit private news programs to broadcast interviews which last longer than ten minutes; during political campaigns, news programs cannot broadcast the voice of a candidate whose campaign rally is being filmed. There is no such restriction on "talk shows." A section of a bill on electoral reform before Congress calls for ensured access to the electronic media for all political parties.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Public meetings, marches, and demonstrations are normally held without interference. Under the state of siege, prior permission is required for demonstrations, but it is usually granted, except when there is a clear and present danger to public order.

Colombian workers freely exercise the right to form unions and, in the private sector, to bargain collectively and strike. There are four labor confederations (including one associated with the Communist Party) and an estimated 7,000 unions. Approximately 12 percent of the total labor force is unionized. Among the four confederations, the Confederation of Colombian Workers and the Union of Colombian Workers are affiliated with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. The remaining two, the Trade Union Confederation of Colombia and the General Confederation of Labor, are affiliated with the World Federation of Trade Unions and the World Confederation of Labor, respectively. The labor code is administered impartially, regardless of the ideology of the union. Trade union leaders participate fully in the electoral process and are often members of the National Congress and municipal assemblies.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Constitution guarantees freedom of religion. Although an overwhelming majority of Colombians are Roman Catholics, no constitutional or practical discrimination exists against any religious group. According to official statistics, 217 different religious sects are registered in Colombia.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Colombians are free to leave the country without unusual restrictions. In areas under military control, where operations against rural guerrilla groups are underway, the movement of civilians requires "safe conduct" passes; guerrillas reportedly use a similar means to restrict travel in areas under their control.

Colombians who have sought and been granted "diplomatic asylum" in foreign embassies have always been allowed to depart. Expatriates can, by law, repatriate, and the right is respected in practice. Colombia in the past has accepted refugees--the most recent case involving Chileans expelled by the Chilean Government in September 1984. However, because of high unemployment and underemployment, the Government is increasingly reluctant to accept displaced persons.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Colombia has a strong two-party democratic system of government, and elections are conducted fairly and openly. Persons over 18 years of age have the constitutional right to vote. Those convicted of certain crimes may be disenfranchised. Public employees are forbidden by law to participate in political campaigns but, with the exception of military personnel, can vote.

Colombian politics are dominated by two major parties, the Liberal and the Conservative. Each includes elements with widely divergent political views. All parties are free to raise funds, field candidates, hold public meetings, have access to the media, and publish their own newspapers. Almost seven million--approximately 60 percent of eligible voters--turned out for the May 30, 1982, Presidential election, the heaviest voter turnout in recent history. Many went to the polls despite guerrilla threats to punish those who did so.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government has actively participated in international and regional human rights bodies, is currently a member of the UN Human Rights Commission, and has invited nongovernmental human rights organizations to visit. Freedom House classifies Colombia as "free." Amnesty International Report 1984 expressed concern about extrajudicial executions and systematic torture carried out "as a matter of policy" by some army and police entities, as well as cases of execution-style killings of kidnap victims held captive by guerrilla organizations. On the other hand, Amnesty International welcomed measures by the Attorney General and civilian courts to investigate and prosecute military and police officials alleged to be responsible for serious abuses of authority.

The Permanent Committee for the Defense of Human Rights is the most active national organization monitoring the local human rights situation. Statistics prepared by this committee have been used extensively by international organizations such as Amnesty International, Americas Watch, and the Washington Office on Latin America. Colombian human rights organizations follow trials of those accused of rebellion, investigate reports of human rights violations, provide defense lawyers, and publish newsletters. Periodic human rights forums are held in Colombia.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The economic slowdown which began in 1980 has continued, and the real Gross Domestic Product growth rate for 1984 is expected to be only one to two percent. Colombia's population of 28,901,000 grew at a rate of 2.1 percent in 1984. Inflation is declining. Government data shows unemployment rose to 13.8 percent in September 1984, with underemployment at 14 to 16 percent. According to Colombian labor experts, official labor statistics do not take into account an estimated 2.5 million children under age 15 who work for low pay under poor conditions and with little protection by the Colombian labor code. Although increases in minimum wages have more than kept pace with increases in the cost of living in recent years, a large percentage of workers do not earn the minimum wage.

Per capita Gross National Product in 1982 was $1,463, but there is inequality in the distribution of the nation's income and wealth. According to a 1983 World Bank report, the wealthiest 10 percent of Colombia's population received 40 percent of the national income, while the poorest 20 percent got only 5 percent. A notable exception to the general pattern of income distribution is in Colombia's important coffee-growing regions, where farms have traditionally been small-to-medium-sized. More recently, some small farms in the higher altitude areas of Bogota and Medellin have been able to take advantage of the increasing export demand for fresh-cut flowers. Colombia has a highly progressive income tax, but tax evasion is widespread and direct taxation is declining as a proportion of government revenue.

Land tenure is a major problem: the top 10 percent of landowners hold 80 percent of the land, while the bottom 10 percent own 0.2 percent. Significant regional inequalities also exist, with the best economic opportunities, health care facilities, and education available in the largest cities. This has contributed to heavy, though decreasing, migration from the countryside to urban aras.

The Betancur Administration has promised to provide 400,000 low-cost housing units between 1983 and 1985 and to concentrate on rural adult literacy and vocational training. The Government will also offer extension courses at the university level to expand education. The 1983 budget for the social sector ministries (labor, government, health, and education) accounted for approximately 28.5 percent of total expenditures.

While there is an excess of teachers nationwide, there is a severe shortage in the countryside. Primary school enrollment has increased, and the adjusted enrollment ratio of 115.8 percent in 1981 is partially explained by frequent repetition and the presence of adolescents and adults in the primary grades. The adult literacy rate was estimated at 81 percent in 1973. Colombia's infant mortality rate was 63.6 per 1,000 live births in 1984. While the ratio of calorie supply available for consumption relative to nutritional requirements in 1977 was 98 percent, per capita consumption of important commodities such as meat, eggs, and milk declined between 1948 and 1978, and malnutrition is a leading cause of death among children under five years. According to World Bank statistics, 63 percent (1976) of the population has access to safe water.

Women have equal civil and property rights by law. Their economic situation, though improving, is inferior, especially in rural aras; they comprise just over 25 percent of the country's economically active population, but are concentrated in low-productivity, low-income sectors. Historically, the unemployment rate for women has been higher than for men, but this difference has decreased in recent years. Although Colombian women are legally entitled to pay equal to that of their male counterparts and are normally paid equal salaries when employed by the Government, this is not generally the case in private industry.

As more Colombian women graduate from universities and participate in the work force, they are increasingly active at all levels of society. A growing number are receiving higher education; they currently comprise 40 percent of the university population. They serve as legislators, judges, department governors, political party leaders, government officials, and diplomats. Perhaps the most obvious indicator of the growing role of Colombian women in urban society is the unprecedented number of high-level women appointees in the Betancur administration. Currently the Ministries of Education and Communication are headed by women. Moreover, female vice ministers have been appointed in the Ministries of Foreign Relations, Justice, Treasury, Agriculture, Development, Mines, Labor, Health, Education, Communications, and Public Works.

Colombian Indians enjoy all rights and privileges of full citizenship. Notwithstanding their constitutional rights, Colombian Indians have at times suffered a wide variety of abuses at the hands of local landowners, cattlemen, and prospectors. The Government has curtailed the worst of such abuses and is now seeking to promote improved local relations through community action, public education, and legal aid.

While there were sporadic land invasions by Indian groups in 1983, an upsurge occurred beginning in mid-1984 and is continuing unabated. While some landowners attribute the surge to leftist political activities, others consider it a natural result of the current politicking over land reform. Whatever the cause, the trend toward increased invasions has generated growing concern among government and land-owning circles.

COSTA RICA

Costa Rica is and has been for decades a functioning constitutional democracy. The Government consists of three independent branches: executive, legislative, and judicial. Elections were last held in February 1982; nearly 80 percent of eligible voters participated. The tradition of alternating political parties in every election since 1948 except one was maintained, and President Luis Alberto Monge of the National Liberation Party (PLN) defeated the candidate of the incumbent Unidad coalition. The President is constitutionally prohibited from succeeding himself as are members of the Legislative Assembly. The 57 deputies in the Assembly are elected at the same time as the President and, like his, their terms of office are four years. The two major political parties now preparing for elections in February 1986 are the National Liberation Party and the United Social Christian Party, recently consolidated from the Unidad coalition. A leftist coalition presently holds four seats in the Legislative Assembly. Included in the coalition is the Communist Party, which freely participates in the political process.

In Costa Rica's mixed economic system, the right to hold private property is legally protected, and approximately 80 percent of the gross national product is produced by the private sector. There are a number of government-owned autonomous agencies which provide both goods and services. The public sector is the nation's largest employer with around 20 percent of the work force. While inflation has been largely brought under control, both unemployment and underemployment continue to be problems, especially among the young.

Both police and national defense functions are performed by the Ministry of Public Security's Civil Guard and the Ministry of Government's constabulary force in the countryside, the Rural Guard. The Judicial Police (OIJ) is an entity of the judicial branch directly responsible to the Supreme Court. The OIJ is charged with investigating crimes. In theory, the primary mission of the security forces of the executive branch is to prevent crimes. In practice there is considerable overlapping in the function between OIJ and the Civil/Rural Guards. Costa Rica abolished its standing army in 1949. The country's security forces, which are subject to civilian control, are few in number and inadequately trained and equipped. With the continuing threat of internal subversion and persistence of troubled relations with Nicaragua, there is widespread popular support for upgrading and making more professional the Civil and Rural Guards. There is no significant public support for creating a professional armed force.

Although there is some concern that Costa Ricans, afflicted with economic problems, especially a high unemployment rate, will eventually react against the increasing numbers of displaced persons and refugees entering the country, they have over the past year preserved their traditional policy of welcoming such persons.

Costa Rica has maintained its excellent human rights record over the past year. The Monge Administration has been particulary sensitive to the need to protect basic human rights.

COSTA RICA

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Neither the Government nor any other political organization has used killing as a political weapon.

b. Disappearance

There have been no known incidents of abductions, secret arrests, or persons held clandestinely by any agency of the Costa Rican Government.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Costa Rican Constitution states that "No one shall be submitted to cruel or degrading treatment nor to life imprisonment. A statement obtained through violence shall have no value." These injunctions are respected in practice. Prisoners are treated humanely in Costa Rican prisons.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Warrants are required for both searches and arrests; the Constitution requires that an arraignment take place within 24 hours of arrest. These requirements are strictly enforced. While convicted foreign terrorists and other non-Costa Ricans have been refused entry or expelled, it is unconstitutional to exile a citizen, and none has been.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Costa Rican judiciary is widely recognized as fair and independent. Accused persons may select their own attorneys. Access to counsel is guaranteed with free public counsel provided for defendants without means. According to a study published in 1983 by the UN-affiliated Latin American Institute for the Prevention of Crime and the Treatment of Offenders, Costa Rica has the lowest percentage of detainees awaiting trial of 18 Latin American countries surveyed. The right to bail is provided for in law and is observed in practice.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

There have been no reported instances of extra-legal invasions of privacy conducted by, or with the knowledge of, agencies of the Costa Rican Government over the past year.

Section 2 Respect For Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution specifically guarantees freedom of speech and press, and these freedoms are fully respected in practice. Both communist parties publish weekly newspapers, and the media report news and information spanning the political spectrum. There are three privately-owned television stations and numerous radio stations which pursue independent editorial policies. The media freely air differences with and criticism of the Government. There is no evidence of either collusion or repression. Terrorist activities are fully covered.

Foreign journalists have protested the Costa Rican courts' refusal to recognize their credentials and allow them to practice their profession in Costa Rica. This issue, involving the Costa Rican National Journalists Association's right to accredit reporters, has been raised before the Inter-American Commission of Human Rights which decided in favor of the Costa Rican authorities.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Constitutional guarantees of freedom of assembly and association are respected in practice. About 14 percent of the work force is organized into unions, primarily in the public sector and on banana plantations. Communist influence in organized labor remains strong. Procedures for collective bargaining and arbitration of labor disputes are prescribed in law and followed in practice. Unions can and do strike. In 1984, there were two major strikes in Costa Rica including a 72 day banana workers strike which proved to be the longest and costliest in Costa Rican history. The strike resulted in two workers' deaths by shooting and numerous injuries in two separate clashes between strikers and the Civil Guard. While accounts conflict, there is strong evidence that the authorities were provoked into firing. No criminal charges have been made. The other major strike involved the powerful teachers' association which, in addition to demanding salary increases for its own sector, called for a broad range of reforms, such as price freezes on basic products and utilities, affecting the more disadvantaged segments of Costa Rican society. Professional groups and associations also have the right to unionize and bargain collectively and have had a major role in representing middle income workers' interests in the political arena. The fastest growing labor movement in the private sector, however, known as Solidarismo, believes that labor/management relations should be non-confrontational and that strikes are counterproductive.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is guaranteed in the Constitution and observed in practice. Roman Catholicism is the official state religion, but other religious groups have significant numbers of adherents, who participate without prejudice in all aspects of the social and political life of the nation. Foreign missionaries and clergy freely enter Costa Rica, and there are no restrictions on religious proselytization.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no unusual restrictions on traveling within the country or abroad. Costa Ricans and foreigners are free to live anywhere within the national boundaries. Costa Rica has supported multinational refugee programs and has accepted many thousands of displaced persons and refugees from other Central American countries as well as many Cubans and South Americans. The continuing large influx of Nicaraguan refugees has seriously strained national resources. Citizenship through birth or naturalization cannot be lost except by abandonment.

COSTA RICA

The Government accepts responsibility for repatriating its own citizens. The Constitution specifically prohibits the Government from repatriating any non-Costa Rican who may be subject to political persecution in his own country. Costa Rica has traditionally afforded political asylum to dissident groups of various political orientations. The only recent challenge to Costa Rica's record in this regard occurred in the case of Ecuadoran citizen Rose Mireya Cardenas, whose return to Ecuador was protested by some Ecuadoran dissidents. However, extraordinary measures were taken by Costa Rican authorities to document that her return was voluntary. Indicative of the Costa Rican legal system's sensitivity on the right of asylum was its recent denial of a request from the Spanish Government for the extradition of an accused Basque terrorist. The latter was arrested in Costa Rica last year for his alleged involvement in an assassination attempt against anti-Sandinista leader Eden Pastora. The court refused to extradite on grounds that the charges pending against him in Spain were of a political nature.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The Constitution provides for a free, open, and competitive electoral system. The integrity of elections is overseen by the independent Supreme Electoral Tribunal. No political party is outlawed or excluded from the electoral process; no party has dominated the affairs of the nation, nor is any eligible voter deterred from participating in elections. Virtually all segments of the population view with hostility any effort by any group, internal or external, to interfere with the free electoral process. Individual citizens can and do regularly petition their elected representatives for legislative redress and assistance with government bureaucracies.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

A strong supporter of international and private human rights organizations, Costa Rica has extended a permanent invitation to the Inter-American Human Rights Commission to visit whenever it wishes. Costa Rica was one of the earliest countries to ratify the American Convention of Human Rights and has accepted the jurisdiction of the Inter-American Institute of Human Rights Court, which is based in San Jose. It hosts the Inter-American Institute of Human Rights (IIHR). Costa Rican government officials at the highest level participate in and actively support the human rights activities of both the Institute and the Court. In 1984, several major international human rights conferences sponsored by the Institute were held in San Jose. Overall, Costa Rica has been in the vanguard in the promotion of human rights institutions. President Monge laid out the rationale for this policy in his opening address at a IIHR human rights course: "The complexity of human relations in modern societies compels us to give more attention to the practical operation of instruments for the protection of human rights, than to public declarations."

In its 1983-1984 report, Freedom House rated Costa Rica "Free." Amnesty International Report 1984, covering the year 1983, expressed concern about the cases, since closed, of persons held for periods exceeding those permitted by law prior to being tried.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Economic problems facing Costa Rica stem from the nation's vulnerability to changes in the prices of its major exports--coffee, bananas, and sugar -- as well as the nation's heavy importation of oil, raw materials, consumer durables, and foodstuffs, and its high level of external borrowing (both from public and private lenders). A government austerity program imposed in conjunction with a standby agreement with the International Monetary Fund (now being renegotiated) has succeeded in lowering the inflation rate, but at the cost of temporarily increasing hardships on large sectors of the population. Unemployment, officially calculated at 9.5 percent and unofficially at 15 percent, has been growing. Underemployment, affecting as much as 20 percent of the population, is particularly acute among recent university graduates who have grown increasingly frustrated over their inability to find employment in their fields of study. The steadily increasing number of refugees from Nicaragua has further aggravated the employment situation. In addition to the 12,000 refugees in Costa Rica receiving financial assistance from refugee relief organizations, the Government estimates there are 250,000 illegal aliens seeking to blend into the already overburdened economy. Despite its myriad problems, Costa Rica's per capita GNP of $1,279 was the highest in Central America in 1982. Economic progress, however, is not uniformly distributed; severe poverty exists in some outlying areas, while development has been most noticeable in the central plateau surrounding the capital of San Jose.

Increased population pressures and economic decline have greatly influenced peasant demands for agricultural land. Groups have been organized, in some cases with communist support, to invade both private and public lands. Squatting, although illegal, continues to be a major problem given the Government's inability to prevent the land invasions and implement an effective and equitable land reform system.

The population of some 2.6 million was growing at a rate of 2.5 percent in 1984, and life expectancy at birth is 73.7 years. The infant mortality rate is now 15.2 per 1000 live births. The country enjoys an adult literacy rate of over 95 percent in urban locales and 83 percent in rural areas; the adjusted primary school enrollment ratio in 1981 was over 105 for males and almost 103 for females. The 1977 figure for calorie supply as a percentage of requirements was 112.68

The role of women, although still primarily domestic, is not limited in Costa Rica. Women are represented in all professions, in the highest ranks of organized labor, in the private sector, and in the Government (occupying prominent positions in the legislature, as well as in the executive branch and the judiciary). Women and minority groups participate freely Costa Rica's elections.

CUBA

Cuba is a Communist state ruled by one man and a handful of close collaborators, most of whom fought with him in the revolution that brought them to power 26 years ago. Together with the state, the Cuban Communist Party dominates all aspects of daily life, controlling the means of production and the distribution of all goods, as well as internal security, public communication, health and education. Internal security is under the direction of the Ministry of Interior, which operates border guards and several other police forces, regulates immigration, and maintains a system of neighborhood informers and block wardens known as the Committees for the Defense of the Revolution.

Cuba had an expanding, modernizing economy with a strong private sector and a growing middle class prior to the revolution; today scarcity is the hallmark of the Cuban economy and most basic necessities are rationed. Some consumer items are sold at extremely high prices in the government-run "parallel market" to absorb excess currency and inhibit black marketeering. There is no private sector, and inefficiency, absenteeism and low productivity characterize the state sector of Cuba's economy. As a result, people must wait in long lines for insufficient quantities of low quality foodstuffs and manufactured goods.

The capricious release of a number of political prisoners during 1984 brought confirmation of continued abuses of basic human rights by the Cuban Government, as well as the denial of fair public trial, the use of torture and other inhuman practices. Arrests continue, many political prisoners have been kept in jail after the expiration of their sentences, and defense lawyers have been arrested and sentenced to lengthy jail terms merely for having tried to defend Cubans accused of political offenses. There is no freedom of speech or press in Cuba, the practice of religion is highly restricted, and some Cubans are so desperate to leave the country that they have risked being shot to death by Cuban security personnel while trying to enter foreign embassies in Havana. Cuba has refused to allow representatives of outside human rights organizations to visit the country, and it continues to deny the flagrant violations of the most basic human rights.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

After the Castro Government seized power in 1959, it promptly began a series of staged trials and summary executions of the regime's opponents. There are credible reports that the use of executions, as a way of discouraging political dissent, continues to this day. In 1983, a group of would-be trade union organizers were initially sentenced to death for trying to form a free trade union, while members of the Jehovah's Witnesses were executed for alleged crimes related to religious practices.

According to credible information sent out of Cuba in the summer of 1984 by the unofficial "Cuban Committee on Human Rights," 37 persons were executed by firing squads between October, 1983 and May, 1984. The Committee also asserted that 131 individuals were condemned to death during the same period. Former political prisoner Jorge Valls Arango, who was released in 1984, has stated that he saw many executions during his more than 20 years in prison.

b. Disappearance

When individuals are arrested by the Cuban secret police, the detainees' friends, neighbors and family members risk retribution if they dare to inquire about them. Rarely are persons accused and tried publicly; more common is a secret trial followed by unacknowledged sentencing. Sometimes the individual may be interrogated and released, often returning too frightened to tell anyone about the experience. A special category of Cubans--those who have emigrated, have become citizens of another country and then return to Cuba--are subject to a highly irregular type of disappearance. These dual nationals are not acknowledged as nationals of the second country by the Cuban Government, and if they are arrested when they visit Cuba, consular access to them is denied. If they disappear, the Cuban Government refuses to provide any information about them to authorities of their new homeland. Amnesty International's 1984 report on Cuba highlights the cases of long-term political prisoners Silvino Rodriguez Barrientos and Guillermo Casasus Toledo who were removed from their cells in Boniato Prison in 1983 by agents of state security and have not been seen or heard from since.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

A number of political prisoners released in June, 1984, provided first hand descriptions of the continuing Cuban use of physical and psychological torture, such as playing of high decibel tapes, continuous threats of death, and withholding of food, water and medical assistance. Basilio Guzman Marrero, who as a young man was active in the revolution against the Batista regime in the late 1950's, had spent 21 years as a political prisoner in Cuban jails. He described his ordeal to members of the University of Maryland student chapter of Amnesty International, describing the plight of a political prisoner arrested at the age of 12, who is now 32, and telling them that forced labor is common, as are beatings at the hands of sadistic guards. Another former political prisoner, Andres Vargas Gomez, has stated that brutality by guards resulted in broken arms and cracked skulls among political prisoners. Freed political prisoner Jorge Valls Arango described "all sorts of physical, psychological and moral violence exerted upon" political prisoners, including the putting out of a prisoner's eye with a bayonet. The Inter-American Human Rights Commission has repeatedly denounced the degrading treatment of political prisoners in violation of the American Declaration, deficient medical treatment, and the deplorable condition of the Cuban prisons.

In some Cuban prisons, prisoners are held in tiny cells or small drawer-like spaces. Fellow inmates disappear without explanation, and many are thought to have been executed. Political prisoners who refuse to agree to political indoctrination or to be classified as common criminals are known as "plantados," and are particularly abused within Cuba's prison system. They spend their days dressed only in pajamas or underwear, or naked. Visits are limited to one or two per year or less, and letters to one per month. Political prisoners are not routinely released at the end of their terms; instead they are freed at the whim of Fidel Castro, often to gain favor with an influential foreign visitor to Cuba. It is quite common for political prisoners to remain jailed after the expiration of lengthy (e.g., twenty years) sentences. Of the 26 political prisoners released in June, 1984, 21 had been incarcerated more than one year beyond the expiration of their sentences. The 1984 Amnesty International Report expressed that organization's main concern about the Cuban Government's "practice of not releasing long-term political prisoners who had completed their sentences."

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

As noted above, arrests are sometimes made secretly, and people arrested for vandalism, practicing religion, or criticizing the regime are often charged with serious crimes such as sabotage and counterrevolutionary activities. In 1984, five youths ranging in age from 16 to 19 were sentenced to terms of up to five years in jail for writing "Viva Reagan" and "Viva U.S.A." on school walls. An American residing in Cuba, who expressed a personal opinion in a non-violent manner to a group of Cubans regarding Cuban activities in Grenada, was arrested, tried, found guilty, and sentenced to six years in prison for spreading "enemy propaganda." When the U.S. Government protested this harsh and unreasonable sentence, the Cuban Government rejected the protest and charged that the U.S. was attempting to interfere in the administration of Cuban justice.

Ricardo Bofill, a former political prisoner who was re-arrested in September, 1983, for attempting to discuss Cuban human rights abuses with visiting foreign journalists, was still in jail at the end of 1984. He has continued his human rights activities on behalf of fellow prisoners inside prison and he was able to smuggle letters out of jail to international human rights organizations detailing further examples of human rights abuses by Cuban authorities. At one time he was held in solitary confinement for 63 days in a dark, small cell after letters written by him were discovered by prison authorities. Bofill reportedly has been in ill health.

Once political prisoners are freed, sometimes they are forbidden from departing Cuba. For example, writer-diplomat Andres Vargas Gomez was forbidden to leave Cuba for one and one-half years following his release from prison.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Although courts are constitutionally described as "independent," in practice they are subordinated to the National Assembly of the People's Power and to the Council of State. All civil courts are presided over by a five-person panel of judges. Three are professionally qualified, and the other two are "workers representatives" who are there to see that the "interests of the revolution" are protected. People accused of certain counterrevolutionary activities are not given a public trial; rather, they are tried and sentenced secretly by military tribunals. Although defense lawyers are theoretically available to all defendants, their zeal is likely to be affected by the knowledge that some defense attorneys have been arrested and jailed simply for having defended those charged with political offenses. One of the lawyers who defended the labor organizers who were arrested in 1983 was sentenced to 19 years in prison in August, 1984.

There are no definitive figures as to the number of political prisoners in Cuba; groups such as Americas Watch and Amnesty International have put the number at between 250 and 1,000, while political prisoners released in June, 1984, contend that there are 144 long term political prisoners ("plantados") and that the total number of political prisoners could be as high as 10,000. The unofficial "Cuban Committee on Human Rights" has asserted that as of May, 1984, there were 390 prisoners of conscience and 800 persons held under the general charge of "dangerousness" (peligrosidad). There are indications that these figures are limited only to the prisoner population at Combinado del Este prison in Havana. One of the reasons that it is difficult to obtain precise figures on political prisoners is that Cuban law no longer distinguishes between criminal and political offenses.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Few aspects of an ordinary Cuban's private life are free from state surveillance. Telephones are monitored, mail is opened, and one's comings and goings are monitored by block wardens who form part of the neighborhood Committees for the Defense of the Revolution (CDR). Members of these committees carry out night-time neighborhood guard service on a "voluntary" basis, and in addition to observing the movement of people in the neighborhood, they also watch out for conspicuous consumption or other signs which might suggest involvement in black market activities. Meetings, parties, and other gatherings are subject to particularly intense scrutiny. Listening to foreign radio and television broadcasts is discouraged. A shrill hum is transmitted to interfere with Voice of America broadcasts in the Havana area, and some Miami radio stations are also jammed. CDR members are effective in monitoring neighborhood listening and viewing habits. Non-communist foreign periodicals are rarely permitted to circulate in Cuba.

Family life is complicated in Cuba, with severe housing shortages, rationing, and strong pressures to participate in "voluntary" Communist party-related activities. Parents believe that teaching their children religious practices, even in the privacy of their homes, will inhibit the child's ability to attain the type of schooling or work he may desire. Nearly all families are coerced into sending their teen-aged children on 45-day stints of "voluntary work" in rural areas. The children are kept in camps, where they are indoctrinated with Party ideology and encouraged to inform on their parents and friends.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

There is no freedom of speech and press in Cuba; all means of communication are owned and controlled by the state. The newspapers are published by the Cuban Communist Party, the government-run labor federation, and other state entities. Intellectual freedom in Cuba is limited to creative expressions that are consonant with what the Government deems to be the best interests of the state. Foreign news from non-Communist sources is not available, and foreign embassies are forbidden to circulate any materials critical of Cuba or any other socialist state. Released political prisoners such as poet Armando Valladares and Jorge Valls Arango have provided eloquent commentary on the lack of intellectual, artistic and academic freedom in Cuba.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of assembly and association are not guaranteed by the Constitution. Any group meeting is likely to be monitored by the CDR or representatives of state security. Nearly all associations are government-controlled; the few private ones which exist are allowed to do so only at the sufferance of the Government. All labor unions are controlled by the state and the Cuban Communist Party. There is no collective bargaining and the right to strike is not recognized.

In its 1984 report, the International Labor Organization's Committee of Experts noted that under Cuba's penal code habitual vagrants may be interned in specialized work establishments or workshop schools or sent to labor collectives for periods of up to four years as a "predelinquency security measure." The Committee observed that the law, which might be used as a means of direct or indirect compulsion to work, should be amended so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention on Forced Labor.

c. Freedom of Religion

Although the Constitution asserts that there is freedom of religion in Cuba, the practice of religion is actively discouraged. CDR members monitor activity at the few neighborhood churches which are still open, forcing churchgoers to attend large downtown churches where they can be more anonymous. Children who admit going to church are ridiculed by their peers, and participation in Communist youth activities is strongly encouraged as an alternative to organized religion. Church-sponsored day schools are not permitted.

Religious groups must register with the Cuban Government and all requests for foreign travel by clerics must be approved by the Ministry of Interior; membership in the Jehovah's Witnesses is prohibited and persons identified with the denomination are denied permission to travel abroad. Some foreign-born priests and missionary nuns are reluctant to leave Cuba for holiday or medical treatment for fear that they will not be permitted to re-enter the country. Religious belief is not compatible with membership in the ruling Cuban Communist Party.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

While movement within the country is unrestricted by law, in practice it is limited by inadequate transportation and lodging facilities. It is difficult to change one's place of work, owing to housing shortages and the need to transfer ration books, which are usually issued on the basis of a family "nucleus" living together. There is no freedom to travel abroad; permission is required both to exit Cuba and to re-enter the country. Permission for tourist travel is rarely granted to those under the age of 60. Permission must also be sought to emigrate, and while waiting for an exit visa, an applicant is likely to lose his job, and may well lose his housing and even his ration book, and find his children refused schooling. Persons who leave Cuba permanently must leave behind almost all their personal and household possessions and are forced to pay discriminatorily high air fares; their relatives abroad are charged excessive fees for documents in order to obtain permission for them to depart.

As an example of how desperate people become to leave Cuba, at least two young Cubans were shot to death and a third clubbed and arrested by Cuban police guarding the Venezuelan Embassy in separate instances in early 1984 when the youths attempted to gain entry to the embassy for the purpose of seeking political asylum and the opportunity to leave the country.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Cuba is a Communist state controlled by the hierarchy of the Cuban Communist Party. Members of the Central Committee and the Politburo are selected by party rulers; "elections" are meaningless exercises which simply ratify choices already made. The National Assembly of People's Power meets briefly twice a year but simply rubber stamps its approval of decisions already made by the party rulers. No opposition is permitted in Cuba; dissidents are either in jail or outside the country. There is no way for citizens to act to change the Government, which is one reason why so many Cubans have already fled their country and many others would do so if they had the chance.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Cuban Government routinely denies that any violations of human rights occur in the country, and it refuses permission for any outside organization to investigate human rights violations in Cuba. The Cuban Government refused to permit investigators from the Inter-American Human Rights Commission to visit Cuba, and it told the International Labor Organization (ILO) that "no one in Cuba is under arrest for trade union or labor activities." Unable to obtain further information from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU), the ILO's Committee on Freedom of Association was obliged in 1984 to drop further consideration of an ICFTU complaint alleging the arrest and imprisonment of striking Cuban workers, and workers trying to organize an independent trade union. Although the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) was helpful to Cuba in arranging the repatriation of Cuban nationals from Grenada in November, 1983, the ICRC has been refused access to Cuban jails or permission to visit political prisoners in Cuba, as has Americas Watch and Amnesty International. The few human rights activists in Cuba who are not in jail are forced to carry out their activities clandestinely, and they must rely upon international non-governmental organizations outside of Cuba for support and publicity.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Cuba was one of the relatively more developed countries in Latin America in the 1950's, and thus the Castro regime had a rather well-developed infrastructure to build upon. Cuba's population of 9,985,000 is growing at an annual rate of 1.1 percent, life expectancy at birth is now 74.7 years, and the infant mortality rate is 20.5 per thousand. The adult literacy rate in 1979 was 95.7 percent for males and 95.1 percent for females. In 1975, 96 percent of the urban population had access to safe water, while in 1970 only 10.9 percent of the rural population had enjoyed the same conditions. Reflecting the emphasis given by the Government to education, which includes a massive campaign to have all adults attain a ninth grade education, the adjusted primary school enrollment (1981) as a percentage of children of primary school age (i.e. of children between 6 and 11 years old) is 113.66 percent for males and 108.97 percent for females.

Cuba's economy is centrally planned in the Marxist-Leninist style, and it receives a vast amount of economic assistance from the Soviet Union, estimated at over $4 billion annually. Notwithstanding such assistance, there are scarcities of many basic necessities, and items such as rice, beans, meat, clothing and shoes are rationed. Some rationed items and other consumer goods are available at very high prices (e.g., $110 for a pair of tennis shoes) on the government-operated "parallel market" which absorbs excess currency and counteracts black market activities. Minimum needs seem to be met, however, since the caloric supply as a percentage of average requirements in 1977 was 114.07 percent.

Although Cuba has constitutionally outlawed discrimination against women and minorities, few women hold high positions in government, despite publicly-proclaimed efforts of the Cuban Communist Party to promote them. Of the 225 full and alternate members of the Central Committee selected in December, 1980, 18 are women. One politburo member, an alternate, is a woman (a sister-in-law of Cuban President Fidel Castro). One woman has reached the rank of colonel in the Cuban Armed Forces (she is the wife of a key member of the Secretariat of the Communist Party). Although women make up 35 percent of the work force, there is no woman on the National Committee of the Cuban Labor Confederation.

Blacks and other minorities are poorly represented in the top levels of government. While they comprise more than one quarter of the population (a greater percentage if mulattoes are included), their representation on the Central Committee (full and alternate members) is about 10 to 15 percent. Only one of the members (full and alternate) of the Politburo is black.

DOMINICA

Dominica is a member of the British Commonwealth, with a system of parliamentary democracy which is a legacy of the pre-1978 British colonial rule. The Prime Minister, Eugenia Charles, was democratically elected in July 1980. A period of political instability, including two armed attempts to overthrow the Government, marked the first year of her tenure, but recently the political atmosphere has calmed. The Charles Government now enjoys broad support, although the opposition is vocal in criticizing the slow progress of economic development. Prime Minister Charles played a visible role as Chairperson of the Organization of Eastern Caribbean States during the Grenada crisis.

Dominica is one of the least developed countries in the Eastern Caribbean. The country has largely recovered from hurricane damage suffered in 1979 and 1980 allowing the Charles Government to focus on encouraging foreign investment and, with the assistance of external donors, to rehabilitate basic economic infrastructure. Slow global recovery from the worldwide recession of the early 1980's has further hampered economic progress and the Government's attempt to develop the country.

The only security force in the country is the police. A Special Service Unit has been organized as a branch of the police, and the police force has also established a marine wing to function as a coast guard. The military was disbanded in 1981 following several violent coup attempts.

Dominica continues to have a good human rights record. There have been no reports of significant violations of human rights in 1984.

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There have been no reports in 1984 of killing for political motives.

b. Disappearance

There have been no reports of disappearance in 1984.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There have been no reports of torture or cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment in 1984. Jones Sampson, one of the six soldiers convicted of murder of a policeman during the 1981 coup attempt, began a hunger strike in prison in September, according to press articles. These articles have also reported that the Dominican Home Affairs Minister stated that the Government had no intention of force-feeding Sampson but would continue to monitor the situation, provide for regular visits by doctors and continue to offer him food.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution provides that anyone arrested shall be brought before a court within 72 hours, and this is honored in practice. The Dominican government abides by the constitutional provisions on arbitrary arrest and imprisonment. There have been no reports of arbitrary arrests, other forms of detention, or summary exile in 1984.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Dominica provides for public trials before an independent and impartial court. There is a presumption of innocence and defendants are allowed legal counsel. An appeal can be made if it is believed that these judicial rights have been violated.

Former Prime Minister Patrick John remains free pending a Privy Council decision on his appeal from a 1982 West Indies Associated States Court of Appeal order that he be tried for coup plotting in 1981.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution prohibits arbitrary entry and search. There have been no reports of the state's arbitrary intrusion into the private life of the individual.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Government affirms the right of free expression, which is provided in the Constitution. The opposition press freely criticizes the Government without interference.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The freedom to assemble peaceably is honored without exception. Opposition groups hold rallies and meetings without hindrance from the Government. Labor has the right to organize and conduct strikes. Labor unions are independent but are small in number and do not constitute a significant political force. The Banana Growers Association is a strong trade association which does play a significant independent political role.

c. Freedom of Religion

Dominicans are primarily Roman Catholic or Anglican. There is also a small Muslim community. No restrictions are enforced against any religious group, including the Rastafarians, although the 1979 "Dread Act" which prohibits membership in the Rastafarian cult is still in force.

d. Freedom of Movement within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

These rights are guaranteed in law and honored in practice.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change their Government

Dominica has a freely elected parliamentary system of government in which citizens have a real choice of policies and candidates from the ruling and opposition parties. In the 1980 elections, the ruling Dominica Freedom Party won 17 seats in the House of Assembly; the Democratic Labour Party and independents each won 2 seats.

DOMINICA

Section 4 Governmental Attitudes Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government is responsive to complaints about any human rights violations.

There are no branches of international human rights organizations in Dominica. The Dominica National Workers Union's human rights committee, a Marxist-Leninist organization, occasionally has published allegations of human rights violations in Dominica. The committee's most recent allegation, in 1983, was that the death of Eustace Bobb was caused by the police. The police have denied this and provided details of an inquest which strongly indicate that Bobb was murdered by members of the Rastafarian movement, with which he was closely identified.

Freedom House again listed Dominica as free on its 1984 "Map of Freedom." Dominica is not mentioned in the 1984 Amnesty International Report.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Dominica is a small and poor country with a population of 74,000 people and a high emigration rate. The 1984 population growth rate was minus 0.2 percent. The country relies heavily on banana exports and subsistence agriculture. Its estimated per capita Gross National Product was $707 in 1982 and is among the lowest in the region.

The Government places significant emphasis on education. With the assistance of external donors, it has rebuilt many primary schools which recent hurricanes had destroyed. Adult literacy is estimated to be 94.1 percent.

The Government has made a concerted effort to improve health care through the construction of public health clinics. A major restructuring of the public health administration has improved the level of service in rural areas. At 15.2 per thousand live births, Dominica has one of the lowest infant mortality rates in the Eastern Caribbean.

There are no legal restrictions on the role of women in Dominican society. Past tradition, where women were limited to the home and family, is rapidly being overcome. Improvement in educational opportunities for women and the example set by Prime Minister Eugenia Charles are expected to lead to greater participation of women in public life.

Freedom House stated in its most recent report that "the rights of the native Caribs may not be fully respected."

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

The Dominican Republic is a constitutional, multiparty democracy with an elected President and bicameral legislature. The Supreme Court heads an independent judiciary whose members are appointed by the Senate. President Salvador Jorge Blanco's four-year term began in August 1982.

The Dominican Republic went through periods of harsh tyranny before and during the dictatorship of Rafael Trujillo from 1930 to 1961. Political turmoil followed Trujillo's assassination, leading to a civil war and U.S. military intervention in 1965. Joaquin Balaguer won an open, competitive election in 1965, but the opposition refused to participate in the 1970 and 1974 elections. In 1978, the country had its first peaceful transfer of power from one elected government to another, and free and fair elections were held again in 1982.

The Dominican Republic is a middle income, developing country with an economy based primarily on agriculture and services. Partly as a result of the Trujillo legacy, the Government accounts for 20 to 25 percent of the Gross Domestic Product and controls several major industries. The national income is unevenly distributed, but there is a significant growing and vigorous middle class.

During 1984 Dominicans continued to exercise the broad range of human rights guaranteed them under the 1966 Constitution. During late April, violent protest demonstrations in the capital and several interior towns were controlled by security forces in actions which left over 60 people dead and several hundred wounded. The disturbances were a reaction to austerity measures implemented by the Government to cope with a severe economic crisis. On that and subsequent occasions, the Government detained Communist political leaders as well as labor leaders on the grounds they were actively planning further illegal protest actions. Those detained were routinely released within the 48-hour constitutional limit for detention without charges.

Despite the violence of the April disturbances and the Government's continued commitment to its economic program including implementation of additional adjustment measures, the political climate remained open. Public debate on the merits of the Government's policies was unrestricted, and political groups continued their organizational activities in expectation of the 1986 elections.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no known instances in 1984 of the killing of persons because of their political views. In April, discontent over sharp price increases and deteriorating economic conditions led to widespread violent disorders. Three days of disturbances left 60 to 80 people dead and two to three hundred people injured. Most deaths occurred when police and military fired on looters. During a protest demonstration over textbook price hikes at the Autonomous University of Santo Domingo on August 24, one student was killed and six were injured in confrontations with the police. The national police, following an extensive investigation by a special commission, arrested and formally charged a police lieutenant with the student's death.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of disappearances in 1984.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution specifically prohibits torture, and torture is not practiced. However, there have been reports of abusive treatment of prisoners. The press routinely reports these and any other abuses of police authority. In most instances, the Government is quick to redress any improper behavior by its forces. Eight members of the national police were disciplined by the chief of police for using excessive violence during the August student demonstrations. A police colonel who shot a motorcyclist during the tense calm following the increase in late August in the price of gasoline and petroleum derivatives was retired from the police force. The motorcyclist had been shot for failing to heed an order to stop.

The inadequately financed prison system suffers from unsanitary conditions and overcrowding. The overcrowding results in part from the slowness of the judicial process under which many prisoners remain in custody while awaiting trial. Prisoners and their families have access to the press, which contributes to deterring cruel, inhuman, or degrading punishment and pressures the Government to take corrective action.

Despite financial constraints, the Government has taken some steps to improve the prison situation. Penal and judicial authorities are devising measures to streamline and accelerate the trial process in order to release prisoners more quickly from the system and relieve overcrowding. In 1984 the Government introduced major penal reform legislation in the Congress.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

There are no known cases of political prisoners being held in Dominican jails. On several occasions in mid-1984, following the April disorders, the Government detained hundreds of members of radical leftist parties, labor organizations, and the campesino movement alleging that they were instigating public disturbances in protest over anticipated gasoline price hikes. Those so detained were routinely released within 48 hours, which is the period that suspects may legally be held for purposes of investigation before arraignment.

There appears to be no evidence of policies or practices of forced labor, although isolated incidents may occur involving Haitian canecutters employed in the country's sugar industry. The Haitian canecutters can quit their jobs and are free to leave the plantations. But those who are illegal residents and those under contract to the National Sugar Council who have abandoned their jobs are subject to deportation. They are not forcibly returned to the fields. While experienced canecutters have no problem in earning the Dominican minimum wage, those who do not meet minimum production standards may be returned to Haiti by the Sugar Council.

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution guarantees a public trial. There is no special court for political or national security cases. Civilians may not be tried by a military court nor members of the armed forces by civilian courts. The appeals procedure, which includes appellate courts and the Supreme Court, is widely utilized. Court-appointed lawyers are provided at public expense to indigents only in criminal cases. They are seldom provided in criminal misdemeanor cases where it is at the court's discretion to do so or not. Prosecuting attorneys are appointed by the executive branch. While the 48 hour limit on detention without arraignment is not scrupulously enforced in common criminal cases, defendants are generally charged very soon after arrest. The charges are clearly stated and made available to the defense counsel.

Judges are selected by the Senate and are independent of the executive branch but subject to removal or transfer by a majority vote in the Senate. Their terms of office correspond to that of the President and other elected officials, ending on the last day of the incumbent administration regardless of date of appointment. Judges have displayed independence in their actions and have not been used to persecute opponents of the administration. However, judges earn a relatively low salary, and the fairness and speediness of some trials have been subject to influence and manipulation, with public allegations that some judges have accepted bribes.

The Government has proposed constitutional reforms aimed at making the judiciary more independent from political pressures and less vulnerable to bribery. There is widespread agreement with this goal, but differences exist between the legislative leadership and the executive branch on the best way to achieve it.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

There have been no reports of arbitrary governmental interference with the private lives of individuals or families. Constitutional safeguards against invasion of the home are normally observed. A residence may not be searched unless the search is made in the presence of a prosecutor or an assistant prosecutor, except in cases of "hot pursuit" or when there is a probable cause to believe that a crime is actually occurring within the residence.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

These liberties are guaranteed by law and respected. Dominican newspapers are privately owned and are rated by the Interamerican Press Association as among the freest in the hemisphere. The numerous privately owned radio and television stations air almost all political points of view, as does the Government-owned radio and television network. Moreover, there is a frequent exchange of views between the Government and all media elements.

There is no Government censorship on political grounds. However, there have been cases in which the Government has taken action against media elements. On March 26, 1984, a privately owned radio station identified with the opposition Reformista Party was closed by the telecommunications board because the station erroneously reported that students from the Autonomous University of Santo Domingo had thrown rocks at President Jorge Blanco's motorcade. Following private discussions between the President and the owner of the radio station, the station resumed broadcasting on July 9. Four stations which were closed during the April disturbances on the grounds that they had incited violence were reopened during the first week in May. While customs authorities from time to time confiscate pro-Communist literature, books of all political persuasions are readily available for public sale. University autonomy and academic freedom are respected by the Government.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of peaceful assembly and association are guaranteed by the Constitution. Outdoor public meetings require official government permits which are routinely granted. Throughout 1984 there were numerous such gatherings of parties and groups of diverse political orientations. Likewise, indoor gatherings of political parties, labor unions, and other associations are unrestricted.

Labor unions have not historically played a significant role in the Dominican Republic, and only 12 percent of the labor force is organized. In the first year of the Jorge Blanco administration, however, over 70 new unions were officially recognized and over 50 collective bargaining pacts were negotiated. Two-thirds of the labor movement is included within the four main labor confederations, but the confederations exercise only a limited degree of control over their affiliates. The largest labor confederation is the General Union of Dominican Workers, which is affiliated with the governing Dominican Revolutionary Party, a member of the Social Democratic Socialist International.

Approximately 30 percent of the Dominican labor union movement is Communist controlled or influenced. The politically affiliated labor organizations frequently pursue partisan political objectives rather than workers' economic demands. The Government has on occasion briefly detained labor union leaders in order to stop strikes or other labor actions it considered illegal.

The continued deterioration of the nation's economy has hampered the growth of organized labor. Unions have the right to negotiate and go on strike, even though they operate under the handicap of a dated labor code written during the Trujillo dictatorship that gives unions few rights vis-a-vis management. For example, there is no effective protection for organizers or union officals. The current administration has however given unions more leeway under the existing legislation than previously and has initiated legislation to modernize and enhance universally recognized labor rights in a revised labor code.

Professional organizations of lawyers, doctors, journalists, etc., function freely. Like the unions, these organizations are free to maintain relations with counterpart international bodies of diverse political philosophies.

c. Freedom of Religion

Approximately 95 percent of the population is Roman Catholic. The Church's preeminent position is accepted by the populace at large and is recognized in the Concordat between the Dominican Republic and the Holy See. Discrimination on racial, religious, or ethnic grounds is prohibited by the Constitution. There are no religious requirements to hold public office, no restrictions on the practice of other religious faiths, and no social discrimination based on religion.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

There are no unusual restrictions on travel within or outside the country. Many political exiles returned to the country after a 1978 amnesty, but a legal ban on the return of certain members of the Trujillo family still exists.

The status and treatment of Haitians living in the Dominican Republic has been criticized by the press and the public, both in the Dominican Republic and abroad. The Haitian community of approximately 500,000 is composed mainly of illegal immigrants seeking employment and better living conditions. This figure also includes about 400 individuals, mostly opponents of Haitian President Duvalier and deserters from the Haitian armed forces, who have received "political refugee" status from the Dominican Government. The illegal immigrants are routinely deported under Dominican immigration law, while those seeking political refuge are not repatriated if the Government determines that they have a legitimate fear of persecution. Some individuals have been deported for failing to obey the provision in the Dominican Constitution that foreigners should not engage in political activity directed against another country. Anti-Duvalier Haitians, when expelled, are sent to countries other than Haiti.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The Dominican Republic is a functioning democracy in which governments are freely elected by the citizens. Opposition groups of the left, right, and center are allowed to operate freely. The change in ruling parties brought about in the 1978 elections, and the free and fair elections held in 1982, demonstrate the established right of citizens to change their government via the ballot box. The ample participation of the opposition Reformista Party and the pro-Cuban Dominican Liberation Party in the independent Dominican legislature has strengthened the climate for political participation. Political parties, other political movements, and the national organization for administration of elections have begun activities in preparation for the 1986 elections.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Dominican Republic participates actively in international and regional human rights bodies and supports human rights issues in international forums. In February 1984, it was host to the meeting of the Human Rights Committee of the Latin American Parliament. The Dominican Republic has ratified the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, and it is a party to the International Covenant on Economic, Social, and Cultural Rights, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, and the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women.

International human rights organizations have been allowed free access to the country. The Government has cooperated fully with the investigation into the sensitive subject of the treatment of Haitian refugees and migrant workers.

Local organizations which freely report and comment on those human rights violations which do occur include the Dominican Union of Solidarity with Latin America, the Ecumenical Center for Human Rights, and the Dominican Union for the Defense of Human Rights. The major allegations of these organizations in 1984 were that the Government used excessive force during the April disturbances and that the detention of leftist and labor figures at that time was a means of harassment rather than investigation. The Government has not harassed these organizations for their criticism of official actions or policies. The latest Freedom House report rated the Dominican Republic "free." The Amnesty International Report for 1984 did not comment on the Dominican Republic.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The Dominican Republic is a poor country with a population of approximately 6.2 million and an estimated annual population growth rate of 2.8 percent. Half of the population is under 16 years of age. The low price of sugar, the country's principal export, and the high cost of energy imports have seriously hurt the economy. Unemployment, now estimated between 25 and 30 percent, is on the increase as economic growth has slowed and more individuals enter the labor market. At least another 20 percent of the labor force are believed to be underemployed. Poverty is widespread. Per capita income is estimated to be 1,365 pesos per year. Although the official exchange rate is one U.S. dollar equals one Dominican peso, the parallel exchange rate, which more accurately reflects the value of the peso, is approximately three to one. At the latter rate, per capita income is 455 dollars per year.

Per capita calorie consumption meets minimum requirements, but only a little over half of the population enjoys access to potable water. Health conditions are poor, particularly in the rural countryside. Life expectancy at birth is 61.4 years, and the infant mortality rate is 78 per 1,000 live births. Primary school enrollment is claimed to be over 90 percent, but some observers estimate the rate to closer to 75 percent. The literacy rate is 67 percent. In 1984, major vaccination and literacy campaigns were continued by the Government in order to attack some of these problems.

While sexual and racial discrimination are prohibited by law, women have not traditionally shared equal social and economic status with men. Women's political rights have been recognized in legislation since 1942. Forty-seven percent of registered voters are women, and women hold both elective and appointed offices in the Government. The Jorge Blanco administration has established an office to encourage the advancement of women, and in 1983 the United Nations International Research and Training Institute for the Advancement of Women set up its headquarters in Santo Domingo. Divorce is easily attainable by either party, and women can hold property in their own names apart from their husbands.

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

There is subtle social discrimination against darker skinned Dominicans, although this has not prevented their success in a variety of fields. Dominicans, for historical reasons and because of sharp cultural differences, are in general strongly prejudiced against Haitians. This prejudice carries over to the minority in the population who are Dominicans of Haitian descent. Cultural creativity and freedom are widely respected and allowed to flourish.

ECUADOR

Ecuador has been a functioning multiparty democracy since 1979, when constitutional government was restored after seven years of military rule. Since the return to democracy, the Government has vigorously upheld the principles of representative rule and respect for civil liberties established in the Constitution, and international human rights organizations have praised Ecuador for its achievements. In 1984 Ecuador held national elections, the results of which were widely accepted as representative of the popular will.

The President exercises control over the police through the Ministry of Government. Local human rights organizations have focused attention on reports of police and military brutality, on poor prison conditions, and on alleged violations of human rights of rural inhabitants and Indians involved in land disputes.

Many problems which Ecuador confronts in maintaining uniformly high human rights standards are attributable to the society's relatively low level of economic development, scarce resource base, wide income inequities, and lack of education and training on the part of law enforcement officials.

On March 27, 1984, in accordance with constitutional provisions, then-President Osvaldo Hurtado declared a state of emergency in Esmeraldas and Napo provinces in response to major anti-government demonstrations which threatened Ecuador's strategic petroleum sector. The state of emergency lasted only 11 days, during which time a nightly curfew and restrictions on public assembly were in effect.

Except for instances of mistreatment of detainees and prison inmates, which the Government does not condone, there were no substantiated cases of major human rights violations in 1984.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no reports in 1984 of killing for political motives. In March the Supreme Court declined to review its 1983 decision absolving the police of responsibility for the deaths of two workers during an illegal factory occupation. Local human rights organizations have occasionally published accounts charging government complicity in the deaths of campesinos or Indians allegedly killed during land disputes. Official investigations into such incidents have failed to confirm the allegations.

b. Disappearance

No instances of official abduction or disappearance were recorded during 1984.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture and inhuman or degrading treatment are prohibited under Ecuadorean law and happen only rarely. Charges of police brutality have occasionally resulted in administrative or judicial action against the perpetrators. A press report in February that 21 Peruvian nationals had been arrested and tortured in the Ecuadorean city of Machala was denied by government officials of both countries. The June 1984 arrest for bank robbery of 14 members of the clandestine Alfaro Vive (AVC) terrorist group was followed by allegations of torture by the group's defense lawyer. In addition, the defense lawyer for another AVC member, arrested upon her voluntary repatriation from Costa Rica in August, charged publicly that she had been tortured while in custody and illegally extradited. Ecuadorean and Costa Rican government authorities have denied these charges, and local human rights groups have given little credence to the allegations.

Limited economic resources account for the generally poor quality of prisons. Cells are frequently overcrowded and lack adequate ventilation, light, and sanitary facilities. Food quality is considered poor, and rehabilitation programs are nearly non-existent. Prison authorities punish inmates for disciplinary reasons. While contrary to government policy, beatings and solitary confinement do occur. Poor prison conditions occasionally provoke hunger strikes among the inmates. In practice, prisoners with money can pay officials to avoid punishment or obtain better living conditions. Some prisoners can qualify for such privileges as day passes, conjugal visits, and the right to establish a business within the prison.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Preventive detention is illegal, and the criminal code forbids isolated confinement for more than 24 hours and detention without charge for more than 48 hours. In some instances, however, people have been held beyond these time limits. Mayors and municipal council presidents are constitutionally empowered to grant habeas corpus. In practice, habeas corpus and bail are granted liberally, irrespective of the severity of the charges. Forced exile is not practiced.

The judicial system suffers from a chronic case backlog, resulting frequently in prison stays of up to two years for detainees awaiting trial. It is reliably estimated that 70 to 80 percent of the prison population has not yet been convicted of any crime. Much of the overcrowding of prisons is thus attributed to the large number of suspects awaiting trial. Time spent in prison awaiting trial counts toward completion of the final sentence. Some long-term detainees have eventually been found innocent.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Defendants have the right to counsel, to face their accusers, to refrain from testifying against themselves, and to appeal their sentences to intermediate courts and to the Supreme Court. Although a public defender system is mandated in the Constitution, this provision has never been implemented. The lawyers' associations of Guayaquil and Quito recently took steps to establish privately supported legal assistance programs.

The National Congress elects the Supreme Court and has the power to impeach judges, fix the judicial branch budget, and ratify the Supreme Court's judicial review decisions. The Supreme Court appoints civil and criminal judges. Beginning in September 1984 the judicial branch became the subject of a political clash between the Febres-Cordero administration and the opposition controlled legislature. The controversy centered on Congress' constitutional authority to shorten the Supreme Court's term of office and led to two courts--one old and one new--claiming constitutional legitimacy. The dispute was resolved in December when both courts resigned, allowing for the selection of a new court acceptable to both the executive branch and its congressional opposition.

Judges play a central role in investigations as well as in deciding guilt or innocence. There is no trial by jury. Legal investigations as well as prosecutions are carried out by the Attorney General, Solicitor General, and provincial prosecutors. These judicial branch officials defend state interests in criminal and civil cases, receive complaints against judges, conduct fiscal inspections of lower courts, and provide often influential legal opinions to all court cases.

Most judges and law enforcement officials are seriously underpaid and thereby susceptible to corruption. In addition they are hampered by an unmanageable backlog of cases and lack of technical and budgetary means to conduct thorough investigations. Several judicial branch spokesmen have complained that recourse to multiple levels of appeal has often resulted in excessive reversals of lower court convictions. The judiciary maintains its independence from the executive branch.

The Autonomous Constitutional Guarantees Tribunal, consisting of representatives of the Presidency, Congress, judiciary, municipalities, and business and labor sectors, may investigate charges of constitutional or human rights violations. The Tribunal reviewed and found constitutional the President's March 1984 decree of a state of emergency in Esmeraldas and Napo provinces. Military courts are empowered to try only those cases involving acts against military installations and infractions of military regulations.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Government respects the sanctity of the home and privacy of correspondence. The law requires police to have a warrant before entering a home except in case of hot pursuit and, in most instances, legal requirements are respected in practice.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution guarantees freedom of speech and expression, and this right is vigorously exercised in the Ecuadorean mass media, which is overwhelmingly privately owned and free from government control. Thirty-five newspapers, 9 television stations, and more than 450 radio stations, representing a wide range of political opinion, operate in Ecuador. There were no recorded instances of media censorship during the 1983-84 national election campaign. In 1984 the Inter-American Press Association praised Ecuador for maintaining freedom of the press.

Despite this creditable record, the Ecuadorean criminal code prohibits written or oral statements which defame or demean public officials, governmental institutions, or national symbols. During the March 1984 state of emergency in Esmeraldas and Napo provinces, the Government temporarily shut down one radio station for attempting to broadcast a message by a local strike committee. During a series of civil disturbances in Guayaquil in October, the Government ordered four local radio stations closed because of anti-government statements. This order was rescinded after a few hours. During the same period, the mayor of Guayaquil was ordered jailed for four days for publicly insulting the President of the republic. This order was apparently never carried out. Citing, among other incidents, the firing of several newspaper and TV journalists, opposition groups have alleged that the government has used its political influence to attempt to limit anti-government media coverage.

There is no political censorship of foreign or domestic books, films, or works of art, nor is there government interference with academic inquiry. In April 1984, however, several political and human rights groups accused the Government of suppressing the freedom of expression of political activist/writer Jaime Galarza, who was convicted of libel in connection with his 1982 book, "Who Killed Roldos?" (President Jaime Roldos died in an airplane crash in 1981.)

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The right to free assembly and association is established in the Constitution and observed in practice. Public rallies require prior consent from local governments, but this is routinely granted. During the March 1984 state of emergency in Esmeraldas and Napo provinces, a night-time curfew and restrictions on the right of public assembly were in effect.

Labor organizations represent perhaps 15 percent of the country's economically active population. Organized into four major confederations and many independent unions, the labor movement reflects widely different political orientations. All private sector employees and government blue-collar workers enjoy the right to organize unions, bargain collectively, and strike. Government white-collar workers may not legally strike, and their labor organizations are not recognized by the Government as full-fledged unions with bargaining rights.

The labor code provides for a considerable government role in the resolution of disputes between labor and management, especially through the Labor Ministry's conciliation tribunals. Trade union leaders are elected by the membership. The Constitution provides for formal labor participation in government through representation on the executive boards of several national institutions. The labor leadership meets regularly with the Labor Minister and other senior government officials to discuss ongoing sectoral problems.

c. Freedom of Religion

Although overwhelmingly Roman Catholic, Ecuador has no state religion. All Ecuadoreans are free to practice the religion of their choice. Clergymen, by local law, may not become high-level elected or appointed government officials. Foreign missionaries of many faiths operate freely in Ecuador. Radio

HCJB, the Voice of the Andes, a U.S.-based evangelical broadcasting company in Ecuador, is a world-wide, multilingual shortwave radio service, which also broadcasts domestically on FM and medium wave.

In November and December a controversy arose surrounding the activities of two Italian priests working with campesino groups in the politically active province of Esmeraldas. The provincial governor alleged that the priests were engaged in subversive activities. The Ecuadorean Episcopate defended the priests against these charges. As of year's end, the Government had not acted on demands by their opponents for the priests' deportation.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Ecuadoreans may travel freely at home or abroad. There is no discriminatory treatment of women or other groups with regard to travel, emigration, or repatriation. Individuals from other Latin American countries have readily found asylum in Ecuador. No cases of involuntary repatriation of persons fleeing political persecution were reported in 1984.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change their Government

Ecuador is a functioning multiparty democracy, with 17 registered political parties representing a wide political spectrum. Two communist parties of differing orientations are legally recognized. Ecuadoreans 18 years of age and over have the right to vote. Voting is mandatory for literates and voluntary for illiterates. Citizens lacking a valid reason for not voting are subject to legal sanctions, although these are seldom imposed. Political participation and suffrage are open to all citizens without discrimination as to sex, ethnic group, or socioeconomic status. All citizens have the right to form and join political parties. Groups not fulfilling party certification requirements, which include obtaining a minimum number of signatures of previously unaffiliated voters, are not entitled to field candidates.

Ecuador held national elections in January and May 1984, in which the President, Vice-President, all 71 Deputies to the National Congress, and almost 700 provincial and local elective officials were chosen. The election campaign was vigorously contested by the 17 parties, which fielded 9 presidential candidates. Almost 79 percent of Ecuador's 3.8 million voters participated in the May 1984 runoff balloting between the top two presidential contenders. On balance the elections took place in an open and fair manner. The first round of elections in January were marred by allegations of electoral fraud, by technical problems with the computerized voter registration system and the nationwide distribution of ballots, and by sporadic violence involving the supporters of one or another candidate. Legal challenges stemming from the fraud charges were taken before the Supreme Electoral Tribunal and, on appeal, to the Ecuadorean Supreme Court, where they were ultimately dismissed.

The August 10 inauguration of President Leon Febres-Cordero marked the first peaceful transfer of power in Ecuador from one democratically elected government to another in 24 years.

Section 4 Government Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government maintains an open and constructive approach to international human rights issues. An Ecuadorean is a member of the Human Rights Committee of the U.N. Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the U.N. Committee on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination. In May 1984 Ecuador proposed that the United Nations issue a yearly report on respect for human rights in all countries rather than in a selected few, thus showing its support for increased international scrutiny of human rights performance. In July 1984 Ecuador accepted, subject to certain reservations, the optional jurisdictions of the Inter-American Human Rights Commission and Court, and the U.N. Human Rights Commission, as stated in Articles 45 and 62 of the American Convention on Human Rights and Article 41 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, respectively. During the 1984 U.N. General Assembly session, Ecuador co-sponsored resolutions seeking to improve the rights of migrant workers and their families, and opposing summary and arbitrary executions.

No international organization or human rights group has seriously questioned the human rights performance of the Ecuadorean Government, and domestic human rights bodies have been free to investigate human rights practices within the country. Freedom House's 1984 report places Ecuador in the category of "free" countries; Amnesty International has not reported on Ecuador in recent years. Representatives of the International Labor Organization's regional office in Lima travel regularly to Ecuador in order to consult with government officials on labor policies and programs.

Among the many human rights organizations based in Ecuador are Amnesty International, which in 1984 re-opened its Ecuador office after several years' inactivity. The regional Latin American Human Rights Association (ALDHU) is headquartered in Quito. Locally active human rights organizations include the Catholic Church-based Ecumenical Human Rights Commission and the National Human Rights Commission. In June 1984 the Government established an inter-institutional commission, composed of Ministry of Government officials and representatives of private human rights groups, to accept and investigate specific allegations of human rights violations. The commission did not meet during 1984. However, individual representatives of human rights groups did occasionally meet with Ministry of Government officials to discuss human rights concerns. In November 1984, the Ecuadorean Congress created a human rights subcommittee to study and hear testimony on complaints of human rights violations stemming from civil disturbances the previous month in Guayaquil, and poor prison conditions nationwide.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Ecuador's population of 8,648,000 is divided nearly equally between urban and rural residents. After a 3.4 percent yearly growth rate during the 1962-74 period, the country's population is now increasing annually by only 2.7 percent. The economy is mixed, with the private sector contributing 60 percent of the nation's production. Key sectors, such as petroleum, telecommunications, and much of the aviation and energy industries, are under government control. The economy has been stagnant since the end of the petroleum boom of the 1970's. In 1983 world recession and the destructive effects of the "El Nino" weather phenomenon contributed to a 3.3 percent negative growth rate and to an inflation rate of 48 percent.

The World Bank calculated Ecuador's per capita Gross National Product in 1982 at $1352. However, the 1983 downturn may have increased the percentage of Ecuadoreans living below the absolute poverty line, which in 1980 was 40 percent in urban areas and 65 percent in rural areas. Nineteen eighty-four saw the beginnings of recovery, with economic growth rebounding to between 2.2 and 3.0 percent, and inflation reduced to 25.1 percent. Although Ecuador lacks precise unemployment statistics, official and semi-official sources have calculated that open urban unemployment was 12 to 15 percent in 1983, and was probably reduced to the 8 to 11 percent range in 1984. Underemployment remains a persistent problem, with at least 50 percent of the work force employed only part-time or temporarily. Despite a legal prohibition on child labor under age 12, the National Development Council (CONADE) estimates that 11 percent of urban children and 62 percent of rural children are part of the active work force.

Considerable strides have been made during the past decade, and especially under the 1979-84 National Development Plan, in the areas of health and education. The World Bank calculates that in 1984 the average life expectancy at birth was 63.28 years and the infant mortality rate was 74.10 per 1000. The caloric supply in 1977 was reported to be 91.88 percent of nutritional requirements. Nonetheless, the Ecuadorean Center for Population Studies and Responsible Parenthood estimates that 40 percent of preschool children and about 90 percent of the rural population suffer from malnutrition. Health care is improving owing to expanded delivery systems and an increased number of doctors. However, many facilities continue to lack adequate numbers of trained personnel and modern equipment. In October the Government sponsored a nationwide inoculation campaign against major childhood diseases, during which 200,000 children under age five were inoculated. According to the World Bank, 42 percent of the population in 1977 (84 percent in the cities and 13 percent in the countryside) had access to potable water. The Febres-Cordero administration has focused particular attention on fulfillment of the President's electoral campaign promise to provide more "bread, housing, and employment." Housing represents an area of immediate concern. Although the average household size has dropped from 5.0 to 4.1 from 1974 to the present, the overall housing deficit is estimated at one million.

World Bank statistics on education in its 1974 report revealed an adult illiteracy rate of 25.8 percent, of which the urban rate was 9.7 percent and the rural rate was 38.2 percent. Male illiteracy was 21.8 percent while female illiteracy was 29.6 percent. According to statistics provided by the National Statistics and Census Institute (INEC), the illiteracy rate was reduced in 1983 to 14.5 percent (7.8 percent in urban areas and 21.5 percent in rural areas). The primary school enrollment ratio in 1979, as calculated by the World Bank, was 115.36, with a male ratio of 117.42 and a female ratio of 113.26. USAID estimates that some 30 percent of school-age children in rural areas do not attend school. The low quality of public education at all levels is cause for serious concern on the part of government officials.

ECUADOR

The Ecuadorean Constitution establishes complete legal equality for men and women. However, owing to the female's traditional role in Latin American societies, there are few highly placed women in the political structure. Fewer than 15 percent of the candidates for elective office in 1984 were female. Three of the 71 congressional deputies elected in 1984 were women; none served in the previous congress except as alternates. Several deputies are also of Indian or mixed ethnic origin. One of Ecuador's leading female political figures heads the Alfarist Radical Front political party. Several women, including a provincial governor and two vice ministers, serve in prominent positions in the present Government. By contrast, despite considerable progress in recent years, women suffer some discrimination under civil law. In divorce matters and in the right of inheritance, the male continues to enjoy preferential status as head of household.

EL SALVADOR

The election of Jose Napoleon Duarte, inaugurated as President on June 1, 1984, represented an important step in El Salvador's five-year evolution as a democratic nation. Virtually the entire country of El Salvador has accepted the results as valid and the new President's authority as legitimate. Preparations are under way for legislative and municipal elections that will be held in March 1985. Although sharply divided on numerous issues, the political parties have respected the constitutional system.

The new Christian Democratic President faces formidable challenges: the country's violent history, a dedicated Marxist insurgency with strong ties to and material support from Nicaragua and the Cuban/Soviet bloc, a severely depressed economy, and still-weak institutions for public administration and the administration of justice. The greatest test to date for the cohesiveness of the new democratic system came in October when President Duarte announced his La Palma initiative for dialogue with the left in his speech at the United Nations General Assembly. The issue has been openly debated, and criticized or embraced, but Duarte's authority to conduct the dialogue, as long as it does not violate the 1983 Constitution by leading to power sharing with the armed insurgents on any basis other than electoral, has been unchallenged.

The new Government is working actively to end violence from both the far right and far left, to strengthen the rule of law and the system of justice, to pursue the dialogue with the armed left within a democratic, constitutional framework, and to restore economic growth while protecting social reforms. The military by and large has accepted that the Armed Forces are bound by the Constitution and must remain apolitical and non-partisan. During the presidential elections and in their relations with the new civilian Government under President Duarte the military has maintained its neutrality and has deferred to civil authority.

The country continues to suffer from an active insurgency with an estimated 9,000 - 11,000 guerrillas of the Farabundo Marti National Liberation Front (FMLN), in conjunction with its political counterpart, the Democratic Revolutionary Front (FDR), a coalition of organizations led by Marxist-Leninists. The insurgent forces have the capability to conduct hit-and-run operations in areas of the country where the Salvadoran Armed Forces lack the resources to maintain a permanent security presence. The FMLN-FDR remains actively engaged in terrorism against both human and economic targets and committed to the overthrow of the constitutionally elected Government. The guerrillas' low level of popular support, however, coupled with declining morale, desertions, and lack of volunteers, have induced the guerrillas to resort to forced recruitment to augment their ranks. In addition the guerrillas have used terrorist tactics and destruction of civilian targets and infrastructure evidently in an attempt to coerce villagers into lending support to the FMLN-FDR or, at a minimum, intimidating the people into not reporting a guerrilla presence to government authorities.

Human rights conditions in El Salvador are strongly affected by the ongoing civil strife. The achievement of a stable public order sufficient to protect individual rights has been disrupted by guerrilla and military operations, partisan hatreds, acts of revenge, fear, and a prevailing uncertainty characterized by violence. This situation contributes to, and is complicated by, the ineffective operation of the judicial system, caused in part by corruption and intimidation. The Government has been working to unclog the court system, however, and has been at least partly successful in its effort to eliminate the backlog of state of emergency cases.

The Armed Forces continue to be accused of human rights abuses, but the focus of these allegations has shifted primarily to the killing of non-combatants by gunfire or aerial bombardment. Most of these accusations, however, originate with the guerrillas themselves or from sources close to and sympathetic to the guerrillas and are in most cases either exaggerated or simply baseless. The great majority of civilian battle deaths appear to take place almost exclusively in connection with operations against legitimate military targets where "masas" (the guerrilla term for their unarmed logistical support personnel) are present. Some allegations of gratuitous violence against civilians continue to occur, however. The Duarte Administration and the military High Command have both served notice that they expect all reasonable precautions to be taken to avoid the death or injury of innocent civilians. President Duarte has issued clear guidelines concerning the use of aerial bombardment in order to codify and strengthen existing rules of engagement.

The brutal phenomenon known as "death squad" assassination activity has not been completely extirpated but has declined dramatically, along with the overall level of civil violence. The best indicative data show civilian deaths to have declined from a level of 444 per month in 1981 and 298 per month in 1982, to 139 per month in 1983 and 46 per month for the second half of 1984, since Duarte took office. The far right extremist Maximiliano Hernandez Martinez Brigade has been silent and inactive in the past year; the Secret Anti-Communist Army (ESA) has issued occasional threatening bulletins, but has claimed authorship of only one killing and one bombing (no injuries) in all of 1984. Indicators and statistics from all sources reflect the dramatic drop in killings attributed to "death squad" activity, except those attributed to the far left Clara Elizabeth Ramirez Brigade.

Human rights abuses remain a central issue in El Salvador. However, there has been substantial progress in the past year. The security forces now provide human rights instruction to their trainees and a chaplain corps is being established for soldiers in the field. Despite occasional violations, the arrest and detention rules issued in December 1983 by the Minister of Defense are now by and large being followed. Accountability for and treatment of arrestees is greatly improved; credible allegations of torture are much diminished.

A prime contributing factor in human rights abuses is a generally inadequate judicial system. Lack of confidence in the availability of justice due to inefficiency, corruption and intimidation is a serious problem, prompting some in the populace to take the law into their own hands. The Duarte Administration is attempting to remedy this problem by strengthening the administration of justice and is implementing several initiatives begun under the previous Government. These include a revisory commission to review the justice system, a special investigative unit for political crimes and especially significant or notorious criminal cases, a forensic laboratory, and a judicial protection unit to shield participants in the judicial process from intimidation or injury. The judicial protection unit completed its first mission when it provided protection in May at the trial of the accused murderers of four American churchwomen.

The economic system underwent a dramatic reform in 1980 when the junta decreed land reform, nationalized the banks, and made cotton, sugar and coffee exports a government monopoly. For a variety of reasons, including the armed conflict, low world prices for El Salvador's export products, high fuel costs and the virtual collapse of the Central American Common Market, El Salvador's gross domestic product (GDP) has suffered a 25 percent decline over the past five years. This decline bottomed out in 1983, and a small increase in GDP is projected for 1984, but not in per capita terms. Foreign investment has yet to resume, domestic private sector confidence has not yet recovered to the point where major new investments are under way, and the economy remains dependent on external assistance.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Many violent deaths in El Salvador go unexplained; it is often impossible to distinguish those that are politically motivated (from either political extreme) from those which are disguised as such in order to evade criminal detection. Nonetheless, a substantial number of unexplained deaths, against the background of prolonged and bitter conflict, can be presumed to be politically related. While absolute numbers for such deaths cannot be determined, it is safe to conclude that those numbers rise or fall correspondingly with the level of overall figures for violent deaths. Death figures compiled from all press reports as violence level indicators since 1980 suggest political killings are now substantially lower than in the past. The trend is clear: late 1980 - over 800 per month; 1981 - 444 per month; 1982 - 298 per month; 1983 - 139 per month; January-June 1984 - 88 per month; and July-November 1984 - 46 per month.

The Duarte Government took steps to tighten discipline and control in order to deal with abuse of authority within the military and other security forces. Officers suspected of death squad type activity were removed from their commands. A key new position, Vice Minister of Defense for Public Security, was created to supervise and coordinate the operations of the security forces; Col. Rodolfo Revelo and Col. Rinaldo Golcher were appointed to head the National and Treasury Police, respectively, and those organizations show improvement in their respect for civil and human rights. The new director of the Treasury Police has disbanded its 110 member intelligence unit, long considered the source of many abuses. It is not possible to state confidently how much residual violence is attributable to individuals who are collaterally officials of the Government or its security forces, but the evidence does clearly support a finding of significant and progressive reduction.

EL SALVADOR

In 1984, there was a sharp decline in terrorist actions for which death squads have claimed responsibility or which can be attributed to them. The Secret Anti-Communist Army apparently was far less active in 1984 than in late 1983, having claimed responsibility for only one murder. However, it did issue several threatening communiques and took responsibility for several victimless bombings. Another identifiable death squad, the "Maximiliano Hernandez Martinez Brigade," was apparently inactive during most of 1984, and a newly formed self-described death squad, "Special Command of the Domingo Monterrosa Barrios Brigade," issued communiques in December threatening to expose and execute leftists in the Government and to demand an explanation for the death of Lt.Col. Monterrosa.

Charges continue to be leveled at the Salvadoran Armed Forces for indiscriminate bombing attacks and gratuitous violence against innocent civilians. President Duarte has investigated some of the more sensational charges of massacres and has stated that he found them to be baseless. He has made it clear, however, that he will not tolerate the wanton use of violence against noncombatant civilians.

In contrast to the situation in the past, there is no credible evidence to suggest that violence against civilians is now even tacit Government policy, nor that its scale in any way approaches the claims of FMLN propaganda or the reports of some human rights groups. As far as can be determined, the majority of alleged civilian deaths stemming from military operations were actually guerrilla combatants. Most of the remainder were among the so-called "masas," the guerrilla term for their supporters who comprise the FMLN logistical support apparatus. These people, although themselves not usually armed, are often present with or near the guerrillas during combat operations, and in guerrilla installations which represent legitimate military targets and periodically come under Armed Forces attack. Sensitive to charges about misuse of air power, however, President Duarte and the military command have modified and strengthened the rules of aerial engagement to help ensure against its accidental or intentional misuse against civilians.

The FMLN-FDR continues to commit significant human rights violations. Some specific examples cited here and in the following section indicate the range of their terrorist activity, which includes kidnappings, killings, forced recruitments, and intimidation of the populace. In January an American citizen was shot and killed when the vehicle in which she was riding with her husband and two small children failed to stop at a guerrilla roadblock. FMLN mining of the runway of a civilian airport in March caused three deaths. According to witnesses, in February guerrilla forces massacred 29 captured soldiers in western El Salvador. An unarmed military judge was killed by would-be kidnappers when he resisted abduction. Two local Red Cross workers who were traveling in a Red Cross ambulance were killed by guerrillas. The Armed Forces of National Liberation (FAL) seized a San Salvador bank in August, killing a civilian guard. In 1984 leftist terrorists killed three retired army officers and three Legislative Assembly deputies; they attempted the murder of a fourth deputy, wounding him badly. According to press reports, leftist groups carried out 63 unambiguously political killings during the first half of 1984.

EL SALVADOR

In November and December anti-government terrorism increased dramatically. The left wing death squad "Clara Elizabeth Ramirez Front" claimed responsibility for the assassination of two U.S. Embassy guards, a Ministry of Justice guard and a civilian official of the National Electric company. Another guerrilla group, the "Raphael Antonio Arce Zablah Brigade" shot and killed two policemen on the street.

b. Disappearance

The number of press-reported civilian disappearances averaged 13 per month through November 1984, for a total of 137. This is well below the levels of 39 per month in 1983, 38 per month in 1982, and 160 per month in 1981. By comparison, Tutela Legal (the legal aid office of the Catholic Archdiocese) reported 107 civilian disappearances January - August 1984. Disappearances occur under a variety of circumstances. Newspaper and eyewitness accounts often describe "armed men in civilian dress" as perpetrators of seizures. Some persons reported to have disappeared are later found dead, others may be in hiding, and still others subsequently are found to have been apprehended and held in unacknowledged detention by security forces only to reappear in the criminal justice system. Under the arrest and detention procedural guidelines in force since December 1983, this latter problem has been reduced. This order requires security force members to be in uniform in all but a few cases and identify themselves while making arrests, and to notify the Armed Forces Chiefs of Staff, the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC), the Government's Human Rights Commission and the detainees' relatives within 24 hours of the arrest. The order permits incarceration only in official prisons and prohibits the use of torture.

Guerrilla units stage kidnappings for ransom or prisoner exchanges. Because the families of kidnap victims generally try to avoid publicity in order to negotiate their release, these kidnappings receive little media coverage. The guerrillas launched a systematic forced recruitment campaign in the spring, in which some 1500 young people of both sexes were abducted. The Church has taken public note of the events. In his homily on December 23, Auxiliary Bishop Rosa Chavez lamented the abduction for ransom by the guerrillas of civilians in the eastern part of the country.

Although most disappearances are routinely attributed by human rights monitoring organizations to the police forces, in the majority of cases it is not possible to substantiate an assertion of involvement by security or military forces in the disappearance. Similarly, it is impossible to tell how many disappearances are actually desertions of family, criminal acts, emigration (typically to the U.S. or neighboring countries), or enlistments into guerrilla ranks. Government policy, to which the chiefs of the security services are publicly committed, condemns violation of human rights via the disappearance of suspected subversives. President Duarte, who has long demanded that the security services act with complete legality, has said that he believes the disappearance problem to be vastly overstated.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Although it is difficult to gather hard evidence in torture cases, incidents of torture and lesser forms of mistreatment continue to be reported, but they are fewer in number than in previous years. The Catholic Church's human rights office, Tutela Legal, asserts that while the number of cases of torture has significantly declined, the methods are more refined with use of electric shock, psychological torture and other techniques that do not leave marks. There have been repeated accusations of rape by captors.

Interviews with detainees and prisoners produce credible claims of torture or harsh treatment, especially during the initial stages of detention to extract confessions. For example, a university student who was abducted in August later turned up at National Police Headquarters showing clear signs of having been tortured. The policy of notification of families and the Human Rights Commission within 24 hours of arrest should, if adhered to, reduce opportunities for torture to occur. The new directors of the National and Treasury Police and National Guard have launched active campaigns to educate their police agents about the Government's policy against torture and cruel and degrading treatment.

According to the Ministry of Defense, 1168 guerrilla combatants and supporters voluntarily turned themselves in to the Government during 1984. An additional 1853 guerrillas and supporters were captured. After an initial debriefing by the intelligence section of the capturing unit, these guerrillas and supporters are transferred to one of the public security forces within 72 hours of capture by the Army. Once they have arrived at the designated security force headquarters, they are treated in accordance with standard arrest procedures including the notification of a family member, the governmental Human Rights Commission, and the ICRC. The prisoners are usually held in small groups for a 15-day incarceration in the security force headquarters. At the end of this period, the prisoner is assigned to an instructional judge under the provisions of Decree 50 as a person accused of armed subversion of the state.

The guerrillas have established a poor record for treatment of captured members of the Armed Forces. While ordinary soldiers are most often released within a few days of capture, officers and cadets are not, but are held prisoner for prolonged periods in order to be used by the guerrillas for later exchanges. Frequently, prisoners released by the guerrillas have exhibited signs of severe beatings, deprivation of food and similar treatment.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Arrests in El Salvador can be made by the security forces without a warrant. The disposition of arrested persons is determined by an instructional magistrate who, like trial magistrates at various levels of the judicial process, may decide on the release or continued detention of a suspect for additional investigation before charges are brought or trial begins. This principle applies to "political" and common crimes alike. In practice, it is impossible to say how many arrests are not based on reasonable probable cause, as even dismissal of charges at the instructional level often reflects either ineffective investigation or is a matter of convenience in an overburdened judicial system.

The Constitution provides for the suspension of constitutional guarantees in times of emergency. Special legislation provides for separate procedures and judicial handling of such politically motivated crimes as treason, sabotage, rebellion and participation in organized groups dedicated to the overthrow of the Government by use of force. Arrest for political beliefs, as such, is not contemplated in law and apparently does not occur. Some 2000 arrests have been made under state of emergency legislation.

Until February 1984, judicial disposition of these crimes was regulated by Decree 507. This legislation was replaced by Decree 50, which was designed to provide increased protection for persons arrested for state of emergency crimes. The Decree halved the periods of permissible detention before a defendant must be charged and brought to trial. If security forces hold a suspect for more than 15 days following arrest without consigning him to an instructional judge, they are in violation of Decree 50 and may be prosecuted for improper imprisonment. Persons arrested under Decree 50 once consigned to a judge may not be held without charge for more than 15 days unless further investigation is ordered by the investigating judge. Persons arrested have no right to counsel before charges are brought but may retain counsel as soon as charged or remanded to detention pending further investigation. Elevation of a case to trial ordinarily must occur no later than 75 days from the date of arrest by the security forces. Any delay beyond this period must be based upon a judicial decree that orders further investigation along specified lines.

Special Decree 50 courts were established immediately after the Decree came into effect, but caseloads, lack of resources and bad management of the system prevent their working as well as they should. Nevertheless, the entire backlog of Decree 507 cases in the instructional phase, which automatically fell under the procedural terms of Decree 50, has now been eliminated, by either dismissing charges (in the majority of cases) or elevating the cases to the trial stage. At present, 270 persons are charged and awaiting trial. The Decree 50 system does not safeguard against arbitrary arrest, but it does preclude prolonged arbitrary detention in "political" cases and provides a formal framework for due process.

In common criminal cases bail is available until sentencing, provided the offense involved is not punishable by more than three years' imprisonment. After arrest, the police may detain a person for up to 72 hours before bringing the case before an investigating magistrate for dismissal or provisional detention pending criminal investigation. In theory, the investigational phase may not last more than 87 days, after which the trial stage must begin or charges be dismissed. Legal detention may, however, be continued for further investigation if so decided by the trial judge or the appellate court. Again, the theoretical framework provides for protection of due process following arrest. In practice, violations of the system occur. If these violations constitute illegal detention, they provide the basis for prosecution of responsible persons on those charges. Prolonged detention is ordinarily the result of repeated extensions of the instructional phase, although the difficulty in coping with the backlog of cases confronting investigating and trial magistrates also plays a role in lengthy detentions.

The scope of the judicial reform project now under way will take these and other issues under full consideration. The revisory commission in charge of the reform process was formally constituted by a presidential decree issued on August 24, 1984. This commission will undertake a diagnostic examination of the entire legal system, beginning with the area of criminal justice. Its objective is to revise the penal code so that it is consistent with the new Constitution and will thus examine existing legislation governing arrest and detention procedures, and propose its modification. The commission is made up of distinguished members of the bar and professors of law, all of whom have a broad comprehension of both Latin American jurisprudence and other systems of law.

In the past, clandestine jails were known to exist, but in 1984 the security forces claim they have been totally eliminated. Despite such claims, however, there were reports during 1984, of temporary detention at such locations. Most arrests are made by the National Police, which holds prisoners in group cells before they are either released by the investigating magistrate or transferred to a regular prison pending investigation of the accusations against them.

Conditions in the penal centers are generally good. Visitors confirm that these facilities are clean and well-run and provide the basic necessities. There have been no recent complaints of ill-treatment by prisoners once they are confined within these prisons. The National Police allow representatives from the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) unimpeded access to their detention facilities. The 360 male political prisoners at Mariona Prison and the 20 female political prisoners at Ilopango Prison, in fact, enjoy an extraordinary amount of freedom in their own separate section, to organize their own cultural, social and educational programs.

There are no legal provisions for exile nor for the revocation of citizenship.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Trials of common or political criminals in El Salvador are neither denied nor unfairly conducted as matters of government policy. However the obvious inadequacy and inefficiency of the judicial system often prevents speedy and effective justice.

Incarcerated persons normally wait from 6 to 18 months before coming to trial while their cases remain open, theoretically under instructional investigation. In fact, of a prison population that fluctuates between 3,500 and 4,000 inmates, only 10 to 15 percent are actually serving sentences as opposed to awaiting trial. When finally tried, most can expect to have charges dismissed at the trial stage or to be acquitted, very often due simply to the poor investigative capacity of the police and magistrate.

At year's end, there was only one person actually serving a sentence for a state-of-emergency crime, a Costa Rican pilot convicted of running guns for the FMLN-FDR. Some 40 to 50 other persons have been convicted of crimes under Decree 507/50 provisions. These persons are normally accused of multiple offenses, usually sabotage or abetting guerrilla activities as well as membership in a subversive (FMLN-FDR) organization. In practice, the instructional phase normally fails to meet the requirements for proof for conviction of the greater offenses, such as sabotage. Thus, Decree 507/50 convictions have been limited to membership in a subversive organization, punishable by imprisonment for not more than one year. Since time served in pre-trial detention is subtracted from the sentence imposed, the effect thus far has been the dismissal of all defendants.

Over the past ten years, the overall conviction rate has never exceeded 20 percent, and in 1983 it was only 14 percent. A few prisoners wait far longer than normal to come to trial. These are usually sensational or sensitive cases which remain under more or less active investigation in an effort to produce evidence for conviction. A good example is the case of ex-Major Roeder, a notorious kidnapper and extortionist who spent two years in detention awaiting trial. When tried, however, (and to widespread outrage) he was acquitted amid suspicion that he had bribed or intimidated the jury. Another example is the case of the STECEL electric union workers, freed in October 1984 after four years of detention prolonged in part because of problems in obtaining adequate legal representation and in part because of wide public opprobrium surrounding their case and the knowledge that a conviction was unlikely.

An effort to grapple with intimidation through the Judicial Protection Unit (JPU) is under study by the Ministry of Justice. It is intended to provide protection to judges, juries and officers of the courts in those difficult or sensitive cases in which intimidation could be expected to come into play. Although the JPU is not yet officially constituted, the Ministry of Justice has completed the preparation of regulations that will govern its activity and the unit should be activated in the near future. The Judicial Protection Unit had its trial run when it was temporarily activated to provide protection in the trial of the murderers of the U.S. churchwomen, which it did effectively.

One crucial component of the work of the Revisory Commission for Judicial Reform is the study of trial procedures, including rules of evidence. It will examine such elements as the extra-judicial confession. Many members of the Salvadoran bar consider such confessions to be inherently unreliable. They favor either outright elimination of confessions as evidence or at least strict measures to ensure the validity of confessions.

The judiciary is independent in theory and, for the greatest part, in practice. However, Supreme Court Magistrates and the Attorney General are chosen by vote in the Legislative Assembly after their candidacies are presented by the political parties. The nominations thus take on a high political coloration. This has had little practical effect on the administration of justice as a whole, but does come into play at the final appellate level. A greater threat to judicial independence has historically been the role of the military. Although it makes no effort to coerce convictions in either criminal cases (i.e. Roeder) or state of emergency cases (like STECEL), the Armed Forces have yet to embrace the principle that they are equal to other citizens before the law. Magistrates are reluctant to take on the responsibility of bringing charges against military officers or the police forces, the members of which cannot be relied upon to testify or otherwise to cooperate in prosecuting crimes allegedly committed by brother officers.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Government does not interfere in personal life except in matters it considers related to the armed conflict. Both the Government and guerrillas use networks of informers. Phone numbers for making denunciations to the Armed Forces have been publicized (although little used), and security forces rely on informers and anonymous denunciations about alleged criminal and subversive activities. On the other hand, there is no campaign to coerce the public into acting as informants.

Members of the security forces use forced entry to carry out arrests and investigations. The official Human Rights Commission no longer maintains statistics on forced entry; other groups have never done so. The constitutional provision protecting the inviolability of correspondence is suspended under the state of siege. Postal officials have the authority to inspect correspondence and do so on occasion.

These provisions may be revised by the legislature (a representative and independent body) when it wishes. Thus far, they have been routinely extended, usually by unanimous vote, on a monthly basis.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

State of siege decrees suspend the constitutional rights of freedom of speech and press but in day-to-day life are seldom invoked. Self-censorship out of fear of violent reprisal, both in the media as well as by individuals, is the leading constraint on free expression in El Salvador. Salvadoran newspapers publish communiques by the extreme left and right out of fear of reprisal.

The two leading newspapers in the capital are conservative, and criticism of the Government from a rightist perspective is vigorous and frequent. The papers frequently run international wire service accounts of controversial local events rather than rely on their own reporters, thus putting some distance between themselves and any criticism which might be generated.

Radio stations are much more vigorous in their pursuit of news, running a wider variety of stories than the newspapers. Radio not only has the best quality news, but also the broadest reach in Salvadoran society. Television devotes little time to news, but its independence and quality fall somewhere between the newspapers and radio stations.

The Government has recently begun to try again to enforce a 5-year-old decree forbidding the publication of anonymous communiques and statements. This was provoked by an announcement by the extremist organization which calls itself the Secret Anti-Communist Army "declaring war" on the La Palma dialogue process. Additionally, the Government has withheld advertisements by government agencies from one ultra-conservative paper because of its extremely anti-government editorial positions.

The publications of the Jesuit-run Central American University continue to criticize the Government from a leftist perspective. Their bi-weekly newspaper and bi-monthly journal, as well as other occasional publications, have made no secret of their philosophical support for the political leaders of the insurrection. In general their criticism shies only at supporting the violent overthrow of the Government. The press (including the conservative press) routinely accepts paid ads from leftist organizations expressing anti-government views.

Academic freedom is guaranteed by the constitution, and is, in principle, quite broadly interpreted. For example, as is the case in many Latin American countries, university authorities routinely assert that local police have no jurisdiction on campus. After having been closed for four years following violent clashes between "students" and the army, the main campus of the University of El Salvador was recently reopened. The rector has said in interviews that he considers political activism to be the duty of every student and that students are free not merely to study at the university, but must also make a political commitment. Arrests or penalties do not appear to be exacted on the basis of violations of limits on freedom of speech and press.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The constitutional right to free assembly and association is suspended under the state of emergency. The Government has reinstated the right of assembly for political parties and peaceful organizations, including church and labor groups, but not for the formal membership organizations of the revolutionary left.

Although now inactive, two FMLN-FDR member organizations are still recognized as legal parties, the MNR (National Revolutionary Movement) and the UDN (National Democratic Union, an explicit communist party front). Pro-left sentiments are also aired through the freedom of expression and assembly accorded to groups that refrain from explicit identification with the armed left. These include the "human rights" organization Committee of Mothers of the Disappeared and the left-dominated Unitarian Labor Movement of El Salvador (MUSYGES).

Salvadoran unions are free and independent from government control. There is no government-sponsored labor federation. The Popular Democratic Unity (UPD), a loose association of peasant organizations and labor unions, joined the Christian Democratic Party (PDC) in an electoral agreement during the 1984 presidential elections. This agreement, known in El Salvador as the "Social Pact," included a promise by the PDC to name UPD peasant leaders to top positions in all of the land reform institutions. Thus far, however, the UPD's presence in the Duarte government does not seem to have compromised the independence of the UPD member organizations. Rather, it has allowed those most affected by the agrarian reform to exercise direct control over agrarian reform institutions.

The Salvadoran labor code is being amended to reflect changes pertaining to labor in the 1983 Constitution and will recognize the right of peasants to organize in labor unions. Although the new Constitution continues to bar public employees of non-autonomous government agencies from organizing into labor unions, these government workers are represented by professional associations whose function is similar to that of unions. Wage increase demands by many public employees gave rise in early 1984 to a series of public employee strikes. Public employee strikes are illegal in El Salvador, but the Government adopted a largely conciliatory approach and ultimately enacted a 10 percent wage increase for all government employees.

El Salvador's labor organizations maintain close relations with most of the important international labor movements. FESINCONSTRANS, El Salvador's largest urban labor federation, is an affiliate of the Interamerican Regional Labor Organization (ORIT), the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions' (ICFTU) regional organization. Many of the member organizations in the leftist-led MUSYGES have loose links with the Communist-dominated World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU) and have sent representatives to WFTU meetings in Prague, Havana and Mexico City in recent years. The four largest leftist-led unions of MUSYGES confederation all enjoy official legal recognition by the Government of El Salvador.

Nine members of the leftist-led Revolutionary Labor Federation (FSR, a member of MUSYGES) were arrested by the National Police in January 1984 for conspiring against the Government. Although the Government displayed evidence against them, most of the FSR detainees were eventually released from prison later that year. Two other leftist labor leaders were detained briefly under suspicion of subversive activities and then released.

There are several complaints against the Government of El Salvador pending before the International Labor Organization's Committee on Freedom of Association. Most concern the arrest of various trade union leaders (for example, the nine FSR members) and the search of trade union premises. All predate the Duarte Government.

Freedom of peaceful assembly is protected in article 560 of the Civil Code as long as the group requesting permission to hold a march or demonstration can demonstrate that it has a legitimate "particular interest" to represent. The Ministry of the Interior issues permits for these marches almost as a matter of course, although it has the legal prerogative to turn down any such request. Democratic unions, leftist labor groups, and anti-government demonstrators have demonstrated freely with National Police protection.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is constitutionally guaranteed in El Salvador and respected in practice. Although historically Roman Catholic, El Salvador has become increasingly multi-denominational, chiefly through the efforts of foreign missionaries now supported by numerous Salvadoran clerics. Although these missionaries generally operate freely and without harassment, some have become victims of violence. In one recent case a Lutheran minister was brutally murdered in eastern El Salvador. The alleged murderers have been arrested and are currently being held for trial.

The Catholic Church continues to be one of the most influential and respected institutions in the country. It uses its influence among the huge number of practicing Catholics to speak out forcefully on social issues, most notably on the need for peace and on human rights matters, from the pulpit and in its church publications.

Over the past year, relations between the Church and the Government, including the military and security forces have become less strained. Although the Church continues to decry human rights violations, it has on numerous occasions recognized the major improvements in the overall human rights situation. The Church's prestige was underscored when it was asked to coordinate and preside at the La Palma meeting between the Government and leaders of the FMLN-FDR. Despite the courageous role of the Catholic Church in moderating the dialogue between the Government and the guerrilla forces, the left and elements of the far right have attacked the Church and the Auxiliary Bishop personally for alleged bias.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Although the state of siege decree formally suspends the constitutional right to free movement, this suspension is not invoked in practice. The continuing armed conflict has displaced an estimated 450,000 persons within El Salvador, primarily in the northern and eastern departments. Another 10,000 displaced Salvadorans live in camps outside El Salvador, primarily in Honduras. Thousands more are thought to be living in Mexico and elsewhere in Central America. Governments (including the Salvadoran), international organizations and private voluntary organizations assist the displaced. The Government has imposed no control on emigration and has assisted amnesty beneficiaries and detainees who wish to settle elsewhere after release. It assists the displaced persons and other individuals wishing to return to El Salvador to reintegrate into society.

Increased forced recruitment by the guerrillas in the northeastern part of the country has caused increased internal displacement and an exodus of Salvadorans who flee into Honduras and then attempt to re-enter El Salvador into government controlled areas.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

1984 saw El Salvador move further in its transition to an open, more participatory democratic system. It enjoys a directly elected legislature and directly elected presidency which may not constitutionally succeed itself. For the first time, a president was elected without the interference of the armed forces, who adopted political neutrality, sought to safeguard the process and renounced their right to vote in the election. The military has explicitly recognized the President's constitutional position as Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces.

Six parties have been represented in the legislature since the 1982 elections. They will run again in March 1985, when mayors will also for the first time be directly elected. Several small political parties are not represented in the legislature but have legal status and freely organize and publish. Right to membership in any legally recognized party is unrestricted.

EL SALVADOR

Two opposition parties of the left, the MNR (National Revolutionary Movement) and the communist UDN (National Democratic Union), are legally recognized but have chosen not to participate in the system. Both are member parties of the FMLN-FDR. The Constitution now permits the legalization of all political parties that do not advocate armed opposition, provided they meet the required minimum membership standards. The Government and the majority of the constitutional opposition have expressed support for the integration of the currently armed leftist groups into the system as disarmed, legal political parties.

Eight parties contested the first round of the Presidential elections held on March 25, 1984, following a prolonged and active period of campaigning. Despite administrative problems and guerrilla interference some 1.4 million votes were cast, representing more than 75 percent of the electorate. As no party obtained an absolute majority of the votes, a second round between the two most successful parties, the Christian Democrats (PDC) led by Jose Napoleon Duarte and the National Republican Alliance (ARENA) of Roberto D'Aubuisson, occurred on May 6, when over 1.5 million Salvadorans turned out to vote in the second round despite guerrilla threats and calls for a boycott. Procedurally, the election went more smoothly than the first round; Jose Napoleon Duarte, emerged as the victor with 54 percent of the popular vote.

The Salvadoran Government invited more than sixty nations and international organizations to observe the March 25 elections and verify their honesty, and approximately thirty nations' representatives returned to El Salvador to observe the second round. Most observers noted administrative problems in the March 25th round but all endorsed the fairness of the elections.

In both election rounds, guerrillas sought to disrupt the vote. Before the first round, they assassinated several political leaders, made threats and propagandized against the election. On March 25 guerrillas successfully blocked delivery of electoral materials to some voting locations, stole thousands of identity documents to prevent citizens from voting and caused a major power failure on election eve. In some cases, electoral materials had to be delivered in the dark, resulting in missing registry pages and other problems. This guerrilla effort to disrupt the voting process had little effect on the turnout.

During the second round, the guerrillas set off bombs in San Salvador, again stole identity documents and launched an attack on San Miguel, the country's third largest city. The Salvadoran Army thwarted the attack and voting proceeded normally in most of the country. In the second round, 46 small municipalities were unable to vote because of guerrilla activity.

There were some charges of political favoritism being shown by local military commanders. However, most proved false and the military in fact, with only negligible exceptions, lived up to its promise of non-interference and neutrality. Extensive offensive operations to prevent a major guerrilla disruption were conducted during both rounds. The strategy proved effective, although it exacted a toll of over 100 deaths of military personnel.

Participation in the political system is not restricted on the basis of class, religion, ethnic background or sex. The members of the legislature and the memberships of the parties represent a heterogenous mixture of Salvadoran society. The President of the National Assembly is a woman and a member of a small opposition party in the Government.

The Government faces clearcut political opposition from the parties which lost in the presidential election, but which constitute a potential majority within the legislature. No coalition has emerged to dominate the political process from either side; many key votes now see ad hoc majorities develop for or against the Government.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Duarte Government has been very forthcoming with visiting human rights missions, consistently providing information, making its officials available for discussion, and permitting the inspection of detention centers.

Human rights delegations who visited in 1984 include the Lawyer's Committee on Human Rights, Faculty Committee on Human Rights in El Salvador and Central America, Lutheran Church delegations, the United Nations Special Rapporteur on Human Rights, Americas Watch, Medical Aid for El Salvador, and the Unitarian Universalist Service Committee. Numerous U.S. Congressional and staff delegations have also looked closely into human rights matters.

Prisoners are interviewed on a systematic basis by representatives of the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) and the Government's Human Rights Commission. Both organizations are notified of arrests of political detainees. The United Nations Human Rights Commission's Special Rapporteur for El Salvador visited that country in September on a fact-finding tour in preparation for his annual report. As in previous years, he had access to high-level Salvadoran officials, including President Duarte and ranking members of the military and security forces. He had free exchanges with local human rights groups, visited Mariona and Ilopango prisons and was permitted to interview detainees. In his report to the UN, he noted the improvements in the general human rights situation over last year, praised the Duarte Government for its increased control over death squad activity and the improved criminal justice system, but expressed concern about civilian casualties from aerial bombardment by Salvadoran forces.

Various other groups have also visited, been granted interviews with Government officials and allowed entry into the prisons.

Amnesty International issued a report in May 1984 on extrajudicial executions in El Salvador based on evidence developed during a visit to El Salvador by that organization in July 1983. The report found that the historical incidence of such executions was massive and that Salvadoran procedures of recording and investigating violent deaths were defective, and urged that Salvadoran authorities ensure that forensic evidence be systematically collected.

EL SALVADOR

Sources of information on political violence include newspapers, the armed forces, court records, human rights organizations, leftist organizations, and personal testimonies. Each of these is subject to limitations and/or biases. Government information on guerrilla casualties is subject to exaggeration. Court records list victims of violence identified by justices of the peace throughout the country. Most reports yield little information on the nature of political violence but, nevertheless, are useful in determining trends.

The official Human Rights Commission, composed of leaders of the Church, labor, private sector and the National Police, was established by the Magana Government to represent individual citizens' interests before the security forces and justice system. The Commission's relations with the Duarte Government and the military security services are good. During the first six months of 1984, the Commission dealt with 1,535 cases, including complaints and inquiries about disappearances, reasons for arrests, and interviews with detainees. The Commission found that 594 persons alleged to be "missing" were actually under arrest in the instructional or trial phase of their cases; 142 persons thought to be under arrest had already been freed; 52 cases were provided urgent financial assistance while under detention; 24 persons alleged to be "missing" were actually cases of FMLN abductions; in two cases persons who were reported as missing were found dead.

Other organizations which report on violence, besides the government Human Rights Commission, include the Legal Aid Office of the Archdiocese (Tutela Legal), Christian Legal Aid (Socorro Juridico Cristiano), and the unofficial El Salvador Human Rights Commission (CDHES). In addition, the Center of Investigation and Documentation of the Jesuit-run University of Central America is a human rights information clearing house. These groups rely primarily on newspaper reporting, supplemented by other sources such as announcements by guerrilla groups and personal testimony.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

El Salvador currently has a per capita gross domestic product (GDP) of approximately $648. In 1983, agriculture accounted for about 21.3 percent and industry 15 percent of GDP. Before 1960, El Salvador's economy was almost completely dependent on a few subsistence crops and coffee. The creation of the Central American Common Market (CACM) in that year stimulated exports of manufactured goods to other Central American countries, and real GDP growth during the 1960's and 1970's exceeded 5 percent per annum.

Nevertheless, many years of neglect of the country's rapidly growing poor population, profound social inequities, and an inability of the country's public and private institutions to address structural disparities produced increasing political violence and terrorism during the 1970's. Despite a military coup in 1979, which brought to power a Government that implemented a series of sweeping economic reforms, political violence increased. The violence, in turn, contributed to further declines in living conditions for the majority of Salvadorans. Thousands were driven from their homes and those who remained suffered from a decrease in public services due to the violence and the Government's financial shortfalls.

EL SALVADOR

Exacerbating economic problems brought on by internal violence were external factors such as the world recession, declining prices for the country's main exports, and sharply reduced demand from El Salvador's trading partners in the CACM. The combined results produced an economic crisis. Between 1979 and 1983, the country experienced a 25 percent reduction in real GDP, a 33 percent decline in exports, a substantial increase in unemployment, large-scale capital flight and a 75 percent reduction in private investment. Only in 1983 was this decline halted. A 2.8 percent annual rate of population growth combined with the highest population density in the western hemisphere (589 people per square mile in 1983) also limits economic opportunity for a large part of the population. The adult literacy rate is about 62 percent, and the primary school enrollment in 1981 was about 83 percent. In 1984, there are 69 infant deaths per 1,000 live births. Life expectancy is 64.5 years. The per capita calorie intake is about 89 percent of nutritional requirements. Limited access to education, health services, improved shelter, and a highly skewed distribution of income and wealth affect dramatically the nature of El Salvador's development.

A dramatic shift in the ownership of over 25 percent of El Salvador's agricultural land brought about under the Agrarian Reform Program has affected El Salvador's social structure. In March 1980, El Salvador instituted sweeping social and economic reforms designed in part to transfer ownership of farmlands from the small number of large landholders to those who worked the land. Under Phase I of the Land Reform Program, all farms of more than 500 hectares (1,235 acres) were converted into worker cooperatives to be managed jointly by their members and the Government Land Reform Institute until the cooperatives are able to manage themselves. The number of beneficiaries under Phase I is 31,359 families. The 1983 Constitution clarified Phase II by establishing a ceiling of 245 hectares (605 acres) that an individual may own, and by giving affected owners three years to sell property in excess of that limit to peasants, small farmers or peasant organizations. The state can expropriate, without prior compensation, any excess land not disposed of during the three-year period. Under Phase III of the Land Reform Process, farms previously rented or sharecropped could be claimed in parcels of up to seven hectares (17.3 acres) by the former renters or sharecroppers. By June 30, 1984, when the opportunity for presentation of claims ended 63,640 persons had filed 79,110 petitions for land under Phase III. Including family members, under Phase III more than 300,000 Salvadorans are now moving towards ownership of the land they work. Landowners affected by Phase III have resisted strongly, often with violence and forced eviction of beneficiaries. Many who have lost land are not wealthy, and there is some evidence that most violence and illegal evictions come from the owners of the smallest, not largest, farms. Many landowners have filed legal protests with the Government, thus contesting the claims and keeping the applicants from the land until the case is resolved. Peasant organizations have complained that the adjudication process takes too long and is too often decided in favor of the landlord.

Although the Government has traditionally supported, and continues to support, private property rights, compensation of former owners has been partial and paid very slowly, mainly because of lack of funds. To date, 256 Phase I properties out of 470 have been compensated.

EL SALVADOR

Under the Constitution women enjoy the same legal rights as men. Women are represented in government in both elected and appointed positions. The President of the Legislative Assembly is a woman, seven women have been elected to the 60-member Assembly as deputies, and two women serve on the city council for San Salvador. Women hold positions of Vice Ministers of Foreign Trade, Public Works, Education, and Justice. Until recently, a woman was president of a major state bank and is currently serving in an equally important financial position. Women serve on the boards of directors of several banks. The majority of elementary teachers, nurses, and secretaries are women, as well as about fifty percent of the teachers on the high school level and between 30 to 40 percent of the university professors, and several deans.

Women also play a role in private industry, especially as owners of small concerns. There are women serving at higher levels, and several major companies are owned and operated by women. Women are well represented in the professions. About 30 percent of the physicians, 50 percent of the dentists and more than 30 percent of the attorneys are women. Women are members of the armed forces as nurses, in administrative areas and in intelligence. Some women have been trained for combat, but no decision has been reached as to whether they will be used in that role. The National Police is training women as detectives and has a corps of policewomen.

A high proportion of women in the lower economic strata are heads of single family households, often fending for large families. Seventy percent of the children in El Salvador are born out of wedlock and most are not legally recognized by their fathers even when occupying the same domicile.

GRENADA

Until December 1984, Grenada was governed by an Interim Advisory Council appointed by Governor General Sir Paul Scoon on November 15, 1983, to fill the vacuum created by events following the bloody internal coup of October 1983. The Advisory Council served as an interim government until national elections were held on December 3, 1984. In those elections, which were free and open and saw a voter turnout estimated at 85 percent, the New National Party of Grenada, led by now Prime Minister Herbert Blaize won 14 of 15 parliamentary seats.

After obtaining independence from the United Kingdom in 1974, Grenada was governed under a Westminster-type parliamentary system. The first prime minister was Sir Eric Gairy. Gairy was accused by his opponents of personal corruption, of rigging the 1976 elections, and of using violence to intimidate his opposition. On March 13, 1979 the New Jewel Movement ousted Sir Eric in a nearly bloodless coup and established the People's Revolutionary Government headed by Prime Minister Maurice Bishop. The People's Revolutionary Government (PRG) under Bishop promised to reestablish an elected parliamentary system and to uphold human rights, but did not fulfill those commitments. A single party government, the Bishop-led PRG suspended the 1974 Constitution, arbitrarily imprisoned political opponents, and curtailed press and other freedoms.

Long-standing divisions within the PRG's ruling elite broke into the open in September 1983 and on October 19 led to the murder of Bishop and a number of his cabinet members as well as an unknown number of other people. Under the titular leadership of army commander Hudson Austin, a new group calling itself the Revolutionary Military Council abolished the PRG and declared a 24-hour, shoot-on-sight curfew.

In the wake of this chaos and recognizing the breakdown in civil order that was taking place, Governor General Sir Paul Scoon, exercising his authority as head of state, appealed for help to other members of the Organization of Eastern Caribbean states, who in turn called on Barbados, Jamaica and the United States for assistance.

U.S. and Caribbean forces landed on Grenada October 25 and, after a brief period of combat, succeeded in restoring order to the island. The Governor General and the Interim Advisory Council he appointed on November 15 reinstated major portions of the 1974 Constitution, including its protection of fundamental freedoms and basic human rights.

During 1984, security in the country was maintained by a combination of Grenadian police personnel and a Caribbean Peace Force (CPF) composed of military and police contingents from neighboring countries, with United States military support. Training programs to create a Grenadian police force capable of maintaining law and order on its own began in 1984.

At the end of 1984, there were no persons detained without charges. The press was free. The political party spectrum included a moderate center, the remnants of the leftist New Jewel Movement and a party led by former Prime Minister Gairy who had been overthrown in 1979. A wide variety of religions were being practiced freely.

Movement is free in and out of Grenada. The preliminary judicial hearings for those accused of murdering former Prime Minister Maurice Bishop and others followed generally accepted standards of due process, and numerous precautions have been taken to protect the legal rights and security of the accused.

The Grenadian economy is in a state of transition. It suffers from past mismanagement, a history of political turmoil and an insufficiently maintained and inadequate infrastructure.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no politically motivated killings in Grenada in 1984. The preliminary inquiry of those accused of the murders of former Prime Minister Maurice Bishop, three other Ministers and two prominent labor leaders, who had been summarily executed, allegely by other members of Bishop's own party, on October 19, 1983 was completed. There were no insurgent or terrorist killings in 1984.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of abduction, hostage-taking, or disappearances carried out by official or non-official elements.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Several of the accused awaiting trial for the murders of Maurice Bishop and members of his cabinet complained that they had been subjected to torture and cruel treatment while in prison. In particular, some prisoners charged that investigators brought to Grenada from the Barbadian police force to look into the involvement of the accused in the events of October 1983 used rough treatment during their interrogations. When specific allegations of torture were made, the prisoners were taken to doctors and no evidence of physical harm was found.

During the first sitting of the High Court in October 1984, Bernard Coard, former Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance and now one of the 19 defendants, claimed that there is a "criminal in charge of the prison who is operating a reign of terror." There has been no evidence, however, to substantiate these allegations.

An inquiry by a Grenadian magistrate began in October 1984 into police charges that four former officials of the PRG caused grievous harm to a number of persons held as political prisoners by the PRG during its rule from 1979 to 1983. Two of the accused are also among the 19 charged with the slaying of Bishop and others.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

In a series of proclamations by the Governor General in November 1983, most provisions of the 1974 Constitution of Grenada were reinstated, and certain "People's Laws" made under the PRG were declared still in force. Special legal provisions to prevent arbitrary arrest and detention came into effect on November 15, 1983, with the publication of the "Preventive Detention Ordinance 1983". This first ordinance under the Interim Government abolished "Emergency Powers" and created an advisory tribunal to review the cases of persons under detention for reasons of security. Section 15 of the Constitution, which guarantees legal representation for persons detained under emergency laws and written notification of the reasons for detention within specified time limits, was applied in relation to all persons detained under that ordinance.

The Preventive Detention Ordinance of 1983 also provided that, except for cases that would endanger "public safety, public order or defence," detainees must be released or formally charged within 72 hours of being apprehended. This ordinance primarily applied to the approximately 48 "security detainees" who had been held in connection with the events leading to the murder of Maurice Bishop and overthrow of the PRG in October 1983. According to the Attorney General's office, the ordinance is for all practical purposes no longer in effect since there are currently no "detainees" in Grenada. In February 1984 formal charges were brought against twenty of the forty-eight initially accused, and the rest were released.

Grenadian police retain the right to arrest individuals "on suspicion" without a warrant, but they are required to abide by time restrictions as to when those detained must be formally charged or released. In 1984 no individuals were detained for political reasons.

Persons in detention are allowed access to a lawyer of their own choosing. The 19 persons charged with the murder of Bishop and others were represented at the preliminary inquiry by a team of seven Jamaican defense lawyers.

There is a functioning system of bail, although those charged with murder (or any capital offense) are not eligible. Habeas corpus is found in Grenadian law and was respected in 1984. There is a fifteen-day period following a court's decision during which the defense may apply for a judicial determination of the legality of the individual's detention, and a two-month period during which a person in detention must be charged or released. These time limits were not fully adhered to early in 1984 under the interim administration. The Government has cited lack of legal staff to prepare charges and the ongoing examination of the detainees involvement in the October 1983 events as reasons for failure to charge them within the legally-required period. By mid-year all former detainees had been charged or released, and there were no further detentions in which the prescribed time limits were violated.

No Grenadian citizen was exiled in 1984, although some members of the PRG have remained out of the country voluntarily. Other former members of Bishop's Government have come and gone freely.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

During the PRG years (1979-1983), a preventive detention tribunal system effectively removed political cases from the judicial system and denied affected citizens a fair trial.

The Interim Government, which was given full legal responsibility for all security detainees being held at the time of the first ordinance, created an advisory tribunal to review the cases of those persons under detention in November 1983.

During 1984, as firm evidence adequate to prosecute many of the individuals did not develop, they were released. By the beginning of the preliminary inquiry in June 1984, of the original 48 charged with the murder of Bishop and his followers and other bystanders, only 20 people were still in custody. The preliminary hearing found that there was sufficient evidence to remand 19 of the 20 over for trial on eleven counts of murder. One person was charged with "acting or conspiring to procure an alteration in the government," and was released on bail after surrendering his passport, at the conclusion of the preliminary inquiry.

The Grenadian judiciary was independent from interference by the Interim Government in 1984. The preliminary inquiry of the persons accused of the murder of Maurice Bishop and others have been fair. Proceedings have been held in a special courtroom constructed on the Richmond Hill compound, in order to ensure the safety of the accused, as well as the witnesses and jury. The Governor General amended the jury ordinance in September 1964 to allow "not less than thirty nor more than sixty persons to serve as jurors," rather than the previous thirty. This expansion of the jurors pool was one more indication of efforts being made by the Interim Government to ensure a fair, public trial for those accused.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

During the state of emergency declared by the Governor General on November 4, 1983 following the events of October, there were widespread searches for caches of illegal weapons and no warrant was needed for members of the Caribbean Peace Force (CPF) to enter and search private homes. After the Emergency Powers Regulations were revoked by the Governor General on November 15, 1983, all foreign and local police forces were required by law to be in possession of a warrant in order to search a private home. Still there were reported a few instances during 1984 in which the CPF, in an effort to locate illegal weapons, entered private homes without a search warrant.

There is no arbitrary interference by the state or any political organization in the private life of individuals. There is no forced membership in any organization, no arbitrary monitoring of telephones nor interference with the teaching of religion.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Interim Government restored the constitutionally guaranteed freedom of speech and press which the PRG had suppressed during its years in power. The New Jewel Movement (NJM) during the 1979-83 period had banned all newspapers except their own officially controlled publications and Alister Hughes' "Grenada Newsletter," the dissemination of which was mostly overseas. Hughes was jailed in October 1983 during the events surrounding the murder of Bishop and publication of the "Grenada Newsletter" was interrupted briefly. Some individuals during the NJM regime were imprisoned for attempting to publish papers the party did not like.

In November 1983, the "Grenadian Voice", which had been suppressed by the NJM, resumed weekly publication with technical and financial assistance from other newspaper companies in the Caribbean. Its editor and publisher, Leslie Pierre, had been imprisoned without charges for over two years under the PRG . Alister and Cynthia Hughes continue to publish "The Grenada Newsletter".

In 1984 there were also three political party organs published on a regular schedule, the "Grenada Guardian" of the Grenada United Labor Party (GULP), the "New Grenadian" of the Christian Democratic Labour Party (CDLP), published in Trinidad but sold in Grenada, and the "Indies Times" of the Maurice Bishop Patriotic Movement (MBPM). The government information service publishes a newsletter called "Newsline" which appears on no fixed schedule and which prints official statements by the Government and reports on the activities of the Governor General.

During the Bishop regime several "People's Laws" amended the Newspaper Ordnance thus severely limiting private ownership of newspaper companies and, in effect, providing for 50 percent Grenadian government ownership. The Governor General's proclamation on November 11, 1983, revoked the particular text of the "People's Laws" concerning the ordnance and freedom of the press was restored in Grenada. The single local radio station, "Radio Grenada," is government owned and operated. The transmitters for Radio Grenada were on temporary loan from the U.S. Army. Programming is done solely by Grenadians. In November 1984, Radio Grenada began giving news reports on local political events and free advertising time to the political candidates prior to the elections December 3. A new transmitter belonging to the Government and designed to replace one destroyed in the 1983 military operations began operating in November 1984.

There was no censorship of the media nor abuse of the freedoms of speech and press in Grenada in 1984. Opposition viewpoints are freely expressed both orally and in writing, and criticism of the Government fully tolerated. There is no surveillance of political meetings or censorhip of books or media by the Government.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Individuals in Grenada have the right to assemble for any purpose, including to protest government policies. Since the violent overthrow of the Bishop regime in October 1983, the right to hold public meetings was suspended only during the state of emergency declared by the Governor General during the first half of November 1983. In 1984, there was no government control over private or public associations, and permits were not required for public meetings.

Workers in Grenada have the unrestricted right to organize independent labor unions and to participate in collective bargaining. Unions play a significant role in the Grenadian work force. It is estimated that approximately 25 percent of the total work force belongs to unions.

Although some unions in Grenada played an active political role in the governments of Prime Ministers Gairy and Bishop, in 1984 they were largely apolitical and free of government control. Individual unionists are personally active in various political parties, but they make a point of separating their private political involvement from their union activities. The Grenada Trade Union Council participates in the conferences of the ILO and is affiliated with the ICFTU via the Caribbean Congress of Labor.

Grenada sent a tripartite delegation to the ILO conference in Geneva in 1984.

c. Freedom of Religion

Grenada's predominant religions are Catholic and Anglican. Although the PRG attempted to discourage religion, particularly among the younger generation, and even jailed outspoken clergymen, Grenada remained a religiously active country. Religious matters are currently covered on the radio and in the newspapers.

There is freedom to practice the religion of one's choice, including Rastafarianism, which was harassed under the previous regime. Clergy, including missionaries, travel freely. There does not appear to be any advantage or disadvantage conferred by adherence to any particular faith, nor is there a religious connection with any political party.

d. Freedom of Movement within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration and Repatriation

There is freedom of movement within Grenada and the right to enter and leave is guaranteed all Grenadian citizens. Emigration in 1984 was not restricted, and Grenadian citizens who left the country were allowed to return freely.

There have been no "repatriates" forcibly returned to Grenada in 1984, nor any known cases of refugees who have come to Grenada.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The principal reason for the appointment of the Interim Advisory Council by the Governor General in November 1983 was to provide a functioning governmental authority until a government was elected under the provisions of the Constitution of Grenada. The Governor General immediately took steps to return Grenada to a constitutional government by means of elections.

The 1974 Constitution of Grenada was largely reinstated on November 15, 1983, and the specifications of the Advisory Council and its legislative powers were set out in a proclamation. In the interest of returning Grenada to a "parliamentary government established under a system of free and fair elections," new electoral procedures were outlined in an ordinance dated March 19, 1984. The ordinance was adhered to during 1984 and a supervisor of elections and staff were appointed and island wide voter registration organized. Voter identification cards were distributed and polling districts organized.

Four political parties formally announced candidates for some or all of the country's 15 constituencies. The Grenada United Labor Party announced candidates for each constituency, and the Maurice Bishop Patriotic Movement put forth 13 candidates.

Eighty-five percent of the voters turned out for the elections on December 3 which, according to international observers, were honest and free from violence. The New National Party won 14 of the 15 parliamentary seats and the Grenada United Labor Party won one seat. The Maurice Bishop Patriotic Movement obtained only 5 percent of the vote and won no parliamentary seats. On December 4 Governor General Sir Paul Scoon swore in Herbert Blaize, head of the New National Party, as Grenada's Prime Minister.

The political system is not dominated by any ethnic group, nor are there any restrictions which limit participation of any elements of the Grenada population.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Interim Government of Grenada welcomed the visits of several human rights organizations in 1984. Government officials met with representatives of non-governmental organizations concerned with the state of human rights in Grenada, including Amnesty International and Americas Watch.

The Government also received correspondence from human rights organizations, especially those formed by Grenadians in the United Kingdom, with regard to specific cases of alleged human rights violations of individuals. The Advisory Council received numerous telexes from trade unions and individuals in the Caribbean, the U.S. and the U.K. which simply "demanded the release" of prisoners, some of whom were active in the NJM's trade union movement. The Inter-American Human Rights Commission (IAHRC) wrote several times to Chairman Brathwaite, forwarding "pertinent points" of letters to them alleging human rights violations. Letters from recognized human rights organizations which requested information on the status of individual cases were answered in a timely manner by the Government. The Government determined not to respond to charges and inquires which it considered to be clearly and primarily propaganda efforts by radical groups. Most complaints or allegations of human rights violations in Grenada concerned specific prisoners at Richmond Hill Prison.

The Interim Government in Grenada made it clear it had nothing to hide regarding its human rights attitudes and practices. A combined human rights group including representatives from Americas Watch and the American Civil Liberties Union visited Grenada in November 1983. In a letter of thanks to Governor General Scoon for his having received them, the group criticized various aspects of the detention of NJM prisoners and made recommendations for correcting alleged abuses. They also had critical comments on other security procedures in Grenada. The Government took steps to investigate the problems pointed out. A subsequent visit was made in September 1984 by the Americas Watch representative.

A representative of the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) visited Grenada in November 1983, in January 1984, and from June to July 1984 and reported on conditions and treatment of detainees at Richmond Hill Prison. The Governor General and the Interim Advisory Council relied on the ICRC's counsel with regard to the prison situation. A visit to Grenada by the OAS Inter-American Human Rights Commission (IAHRC) was requested by the Chairman of the Advisory Council in August 1984.

There are no active internal human rights organizations in Grenada, but the government has been conscious of international human rights matters in 1984. Amnesty International reported on human rights in Grenada in its "Torture in the 80's" and in the "Amnesty International Report 1984," covering a period when the People's Revolutionary Government was still in power. Freedom House in its 1984-85 report rated Grenada "partly free" on the basis of the pre-election period, noting an advance in freedom under the Interim Government and expectation of a return to parliamentary democracy responsive to the will of the majority as a result of the December election.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The interim administration moved to diminish the role of the Government in the economy, while taking a series of steps to promote private sector business and investment activity. It revised the investment code, relaxed exchange controls, and began divesting several state enterprises. Grenada is receiving foreign aid from the U.S. and other sources, which is being used to complete the international airport and repair infrastructure. Unemployment has not dropped remained at a roughly estimated 30 percent.

Although the World Bank estimates Grenada's population to be 113,000, a more realistic estimate would be 90,000. This is based on a 1981 census and the results of the 1984 voter enumeration process. On the basis of the latest IMF estimate of gross domestic product for 1983 ($116 million) and the lower population estimate, per capita income is about $1288. The World Bank estimate of per capita gross national product was $761.50 in 1982. Income distribution is fairly even.

World Bank statistics estimate population growth at 1.3 percent a year; the Caribbean Development Bank estimate is .9 percent.

Outward migration from Grenada has been a continually significant factor in stabilising the population. Infant mortality is estimated by the World Bank to be 22.2 per 1000 live births in 1984. According to statistics from the Ministry of Health, the death rate for infants under one year was 31.79 per 1000 in 1981, an increase of 8.07 per 1000 over 1980. Life expectancy in Grenada is 70.8 years, according to World Bank data.

Some basic level of health care is available to all Grenadians. According to Project Hope officials who work with the Ministry of Health, a significant health care problem is the lack of trained personnel. In addition, although there are medical care facilities, including a general hospital, six health centers, and several "visiting stations," these are not always in good repair, and medical equipment is frequently old or broken down. Methods of recording births, deaths, and diseases are not standardized, and thus it is difficult to rely on local statistics to estimate the extent to which the population's health needs are met.

GRENADA

Adult literacy, according to the World Bank, was 97.8 percent in 1979. However, functional illiteracy is high among youths, and was estimated at 30 percent in 1980, according to local sources. The primary school enrollment ratio was estimated by the World Bank to be 104.5 percent in 1980, and there is compulsory education for all children ages 5 to 16. Daily attendance is highly variable.

One hundred percent of the urban population and 77 percent of the rural population had access to safe water in 1975, according to World Bank data. This may have declined slightly by 1984 due to chronic problems of water distribution in the urban area near the capital. The same data indicate that the ratio of calorie supply available for consumption was almost 90 percent (1977) of nutritional requirements. Although it is estimated that malnutrition is not a significant problem in Grenada, due in part to the fertility of the land and availability of fruits, vegetables and fish to even the poorest individual, nutritional status is impacted by high levels of gastroenteritis, with 2,311 cases reported by the Ministry of Health in 1982.

While there is no formal, government-sanctioned discrimination against women in Grenada, they frequently are paid slightly less than men performing the same work. "Skilled" jobs for women such as in spice factories also tend to be the lowest paid jobs. In more highly skilled work, women tend to be equally paid, although there are fewer of them. One of nine members on the Advisory Council was a woman and two were elected to Parliament.

GUATEMALA

Guatemala continued in 1984 to be ruled by a de facto military government, headed by Chief of State, General Oscar Humberto Mejia Victores, which took significant steps during the year to return the country to democratic rule. Constituent assembly elections were held freely in 1984, and national elections were announced for 1985. Although both civilians and military officers hold cabinet-level positions and are delegated important responsibilities, ultimate authority presently rests with the military.

Overall human rights conditions improved in 1984. The United Nations Special Rapporteur noted several areas of improvement in his report to the UN General Assembly following an August visit to Guatemala, citing resettlement of internally displaced persons, government grants of land titles to Indians, pardons and release of those convicted by Special Tribunals, and a continuing good record in the area of freedom of speech, assembly and the press. Politically related deaths remained significantly below the 1981-82 levels although they continued to be a major problem; kidnappings and disappearances, however, increased. The offer of amnesty for those associated with the insurgency remained open all year, and several thousand reportedly took advantage of it. As in 1983, there were no verified instances of massacres of Indians. The Government demonstrated in several ways increased sensitivity to human rights questions. A substantial number of police were either indicted for crimes or corruption or dismissed from the force, and the Army removed an officer from his command in one location in response to complaints from the community. There is a growing awareness in the military that repression and fear were counterproductive in the past to the goal of controlling insurgency. However, sporadic abuse still does occur at the local command level.

The military is devoting increased priority to addressing the root causes of the insurgency, and this has taken much of the initiative from the guerrilla organizations. While a low intensity conflict continues, the guerrilla groups have seen much of their urban infrastructure dismantled and much of the highlands has come under control of the Government. Guerrilla groups still engage in deadly ambushes, but the number of such incidents has decreased, and the number of reported combat-related deaths was only one-half of 1983 levels.

Elections for a Constituent Assembly took place on July 1. In the largest turnout in Guatemalan history, over 72 percent of the 2.6 million registered voters participated. International observers characterized these elections as open and honest. Nine political groups won seats in the Assembly, with three parties (representing the right, center, and left of the democratic spectrum) dominating the outcome. The Assembly was seated on August 1 and is actively engaged in drafting a constitution, and laws regulating elections and habeas corpus. This task is expected to be concluded in early 1985, after which Chief of State Mejia has publicly stated that national elections will be convoked, and power handed over to the winners.

Guatemala is primarily an agricultural country with a dual culture in which the majority indigenous population continues to observe traditional values. The economy has been in recession since 1980, which has adversely affected the Government's ability to deal as it would like with pressing economic and social problems.

The Civil Defense Force totaled approximately 900,000 members at the end of 1984. A code of conduct was reissued to each member during the year and, with continued training, they have played a major role in the pacification process. Although concern had been expressed that the Civil Defense Force might become a factor in the political process, credible observers to the Constituent Assembly elections found that this did not occur.

Women were noticeably more active in the political process during the Constituent Assembly elections. The Roman Catholic Church spoke out strongly against violence during the year, and urged citizens to participate in the political process. A local group was formed seeking the return of disappeared persons and has functioned openly without interference. The Government established a Tripartite Commission to investigate cases of disappearances, and invited outsiders to accompany the Commission on factfinding trips. A number of asylees in diplomatic missions were granted safe passage to leave the country. Press freedom was more evident; labor unions were more active although they were confronted with continued employer resistance to organizational efforts and by bureaucratic delays in complying with legal formalities. The right to private property and to pursue private interests continued to be respected. Among the negative aspects of the year's developments were infringements of the integrity of the judicial process, increased numbers of disappearances, and continued abuses by both guerrillas and security forces.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

During 1984 there were an estimated 525 civilian non-combatant deaths. Some were believed to be victims of the Guatemalan security forces, others victims of the civil defense patrols, and others died from the activities of the four Marxist-Leninist guerrilla groups. In all, approximately 993 persons are believed to have been killed for political reasons or in combat, compared to an estimated 1564 persons killed through political violence and warfare in 1983. As in 1983, the level of violent deaths in Guatemala in 1984 remained significantly below that of 1981 and 1982: 993 violent deaths compared to 3,573 in 1982 and 525 civilian non-combatant deaths, compared to 2,240 in 1982.

While there were fewer reports of violence and political deaths in the countryside, continuing a trend which began after the military coup in 1982, allegations of abuses against Guatemala's Indian population continued to be made. Most of the alleged incidents reported in 1984 involved individuals in isolated areas of the western highlands, an area of Marxist guerrilla activities, where Guatemalan Government forces continued to engage guerrillas. There were no credible reports of massacres during the year.

Many of the victims of guerrilla violence were members of the Government's security forces, but the guerrillas also continued killing municipal workers, farm owners and managers, and other civilians. In at least six incidents reported in July and August in the country's Pacific slope farming area, ranch properties were burned or destroyed, farm workers abused, and several ranch owners fired upon by guerrillas. Two business owners were reported killed.

In August, an insurgent group ambushed a civilian engineering unit of the Guatemalan military which unit was working on a road project in El Quiché Department. Seventeen Government employees were reportedly killed and more than a dozen wounded.

Killings were also reported to have been committed by some of the 900,000 members of the civil defense patrols, sometimes in clashes between neighboring patrols or between civil defense members and civilians over land disputes and in personal vendettas. There were unsubstantiated allegations that in some cases military personnel turned over guerrillas or suspected guerrillas to civil defense patrols for summary execution.

There is no evidence that the Government has consistently punished members of the security forces in cases of arbitrary deaths--although some alleged offenders have been dismissed--but there are reports that members of civil defense forces have been more severely disciplined for abuses. Late in the year seventeen members of one patrol were given thirty-year prison terms for murdering four villagers. A 14-point code of conduct governing standards of behavior for the civil defense patrols was reissued; it emphasized the social responsibility of the patrols.

For many reasons, it is difficult to apportion responsibility for many killings. The guerrillas on occasion use the same weapons, tactics and uniforms as the army in an effort to place blame on government forces. However, the security forces have been charged with using the same tactic. Bodies frequently appear without evidence of who was responsible for the murders--or whether there was, in fact, any political motive for the killing. Such cases, in which there is much speculation and few facts, comprise the bulk of the killings in Guatemala.

There were many examples during 1984 of the kind of violent incidents endemic in Guatemala, including: (A) The August 15 murder of the son of Elder Sesam Lopez, a member of the Constituent Assembly. The father accused certain members of the national police of being responsible for the murder, and the Constituent Assembly passed a resolution demanding an investigation by the Chief of State. The police, denying any role, declared the murders to be the result of common crime and promised to bring the culprits to justice. (B) The discovery of 12 bodies, tentatively identified as highland Indians, in a clandestine grave site in October. The Government announced that the victims had been identified as members of civil defense patrols, implying that insurgent groups were responsible for the murders. (C) The murders, in late October, of two professors of the National University killed in separate attacks. In none of these cases has there been evidence that specifically links the deaths to the victims' political or professional activities, making it impossible to determine the cause or the authors of the act.

GUATEMALA

b. Disappearance

There was an increase in the number of kidnappings and disappearances in 1984. Kidnappings were believed to have been carried out for criminal reasons (ransom gangs and narcotics traffickers), for private vengeance, or for political reasons by various groups including Guatemalan security forces and the guerrillas. The security forces often take into custody suspects for questioning about subversive activities, while officially denying that they have done so. They almost always also deny knowledge of the whereabouts of the disappeared persons in response to inquiries. Some kidnap victims eventually reappear alive; these have included the Christian Democratic Party Youth leader Edgar René Villar, a villager from Santiago Atitlan, an evangelical minister from Guatemala City, the leader of a farm workers union, and several urban union leaders. Several groups of Indians being held captive by guerrilla groups in the interior were rescued by government forces during the year.

Government security forces were alleged to have been implicated in the October kidnapping of Domingo Ochoa, an affiliate of the Union of National Center (UCN) political party. A party spokesman accused an officer of the investigative branch (DIT) of the National Police of responsibility. The UCN spokesman linked the DIT official to the rival National Liberation Movement (MLN) party.

Students and faculty at the National University of San Carlos continued to be the object of kidnappings in 1984. Some of these cases were attributed to government security forces acting against suspected leftist sympathizers or their supporters. A "Group of Mutual Support," formed in 1984 and comprised in large part of families of missing students, named at least 40 relatives as victims of disappearances during the year.

While various cases have been attributed to government forces or political extremists of the far left or far right, the bulk of disappearances are in fact never definitely linked to any faction.

Some disappearances are eventually found to have other explanations. Amanda Avilez, a court official who was declared in an October news headline to have been abducted, was reported by another newspaper of the same date as having been located at a hospital, the victim of an attack by a disgruntled citizen who was upset with a judicial decision the victim had made. Persons involved with the insurgency are known to leave the country for travel to Soviet bloc countries, Cuba, or Mexico, by pretending to disappear. Friends or relatives, uninformed of their intentions, report them as kidnapped or disappeared.

Definitive statistics on the number of missing or kidnapped individuals are impossible to obtain. Foremost among the limiting factors is the accuracy of media reporting, the unwillingness of relatives and friends in some cases to reveal the occurrence, and the inability of outsiders to separate political from other motives. Although there is little consensus on causes of kidnappings, the economic downturn figures prominently. Guatemalan National Police statistics for the first six months of 1984, for 97 solved kidnap cases, state that 90 percent had a financial motive. Whatever the mix of causes, overall disappearances and kidnappings with possible political motivations in 1984 rose to an estimated 425 compared to 307 for 1983.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There is considerable evidence that harsh treatment and/or torture is inflicted upon detained persons in Guatemala. Newspapers report with regularity the discovery of bodies showing evidence of torture. That torture occurs is beyond dispute, but the identity of the perpetrators can be determined only inferentially. Security forces, vigilante groups, guerrilla organizations, criminals, or private citizens at various times have been held responsible for these acts.

In November, the Guatemalan Army rescued some 55 peasants held captive by the guerrillas in an insurgent training camp. The rescued peasants, all in poor health and suffering from malnutrition, were used as servants and camp workers by the guerrillas. Included among them were 35 children.

Some human rights groups assert the existence of secret government prisons where harsh treatment occurs (most frequently mentioned is the basement of the old "Escuela Politécnica"). The Government denies these allegations and, their accuracy has never been confirmed. In late November the Government announced the creation of a Tripartite Commission to investigate disappearances. Allegations that the newly-established "model villages" are somehow equivalent to concentration camps are not credible, and do not accurately reflect the views of inhabitants or most outside observers.

The principal government prison, Granja Penal Pavon, located near Guatemala City was subject to strikes and riots in 1984. Government officials have acknowledged that the prison population of some 2,100 was in excess of the facility's design capacity and that the budget was inadequate for the number of prisoners. Prison officials blamed the overcrowding on insufficient financial resources which prevented the construction of new facilites; much of the violence in that facility was attributed to drug use and trafficking.

Infopress-Centro Americana, in its July 26 issue, reported that 18 prisoners were discovered being held in underground cells at Pavon by a new prison director who replaced his dismissed predecessor, and that the prisoners were returned to the regular prison population.

Government officials periodically took action against police officials charged with violations of law. In July, two policemen were indicted in the beating death of a prisoner in Puerto Barrios. During the course of the year over 400 policemen were indicted, according to government statistics, for various crimes, and over 300 treasury police were dismissed as well on suspicion of complicity in various crimes.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Involuntary exile is not utilized as a form of punishment, nor are critics of the Government arrested and convicted on unrelated charges. The current Government facilitated, during 1984, the voluntary departure from the country of persons who sought refuge in the Belgian, Ecuadorian, Venezuelan and, reportedly, other diplomatic missions.

Forced labor is not practiced. Service in the civilian self-defense patrols in many rural areas takes on the character of a requirement for able-bodied males. This practice has come under criticism from the Guatemalan Episcopal Conference whose members consider this a form of involuntary labor.

Under the Guatemalan legal code, persons may not be held for more than 48 hours without being brought before a judge. Despite this and other legal provisions, the illegal detention of individuals suspected of having subversive sympathies continues to be a serious problem. Persons are held incommunicado for varying periods of time, with no clear pattern evident. The Government officially denies that any political prisoners are held in custody.

In February the Government published a list of 87 persons previously reported missing or kidnapped, who were in the custody of the National Police. No names of prominent missing persons appeared in this list, however. The bulk of the individuals appeared to be common criminals. Both National Liberation Movement and United Anti-Communist party spokesmen condemned the irony of writs of habeas corpus having been returned stating that the persons were not in custody, while officials later admitted that they may have actually been in police custody at the time.

In April, a Mexican-based organization aligned with the violent leftist Revolutionary Organization of the People in Arms, requested writs of habeas corpus for 157 missing persons; none was successful. In May the same group requested habeas corpus writs for 54 additional persons, and 51 were successful. Some of these persons were located in prison, having been convicted in regular trials, and others had already been released upon completion or commutation of their sentences. In August, the "Group of Mutual Support for the Safe Return of Our Children, Spouses, Parents and Siblings" published the names and photographs of 120 persons who had disappeared since 1982. Other groups have also petitioned the courts for the release of 310 individuals who had disappeared. In August, the Archbishop of Guatemala, Monsignor Prospero Penados, told reporters that "even though there is no proof, it is possible that some members of the security forces are involved in kidnappings." He acknowledged that it was difficult to assign responsibility to any particular group for a specific act because guerrilla groups commit the same types of acts.

In July, the Government granted a full pardon for all persons who had been convicted on criminal charges by the now abolished secret special courts. The pardon did not apply to civil penalties (restitution to victims, etc.) levied at the same time against those convicted by the special courts. The President of the Supreme Court said that he had no statistics on the numbers of persons processed by the defunct special courts, explaining that many of those arrested were released within hours of arrest without a record being kept; some were convicted by the court of the first instance, but released after review by the court of the second instance; many were transferred to the civil courts for trial; while others were tried, convicted, and sentenced within the special courts. Apparently only in the latter case were complete files kept.

Beginning in about April the Detective Division of the National Police (Departamento de Investigaciones Tecnicas - DIT) allegedly began a practice of arresting and holding defense attorneys for periods of 24-72 hours on charges of complicity when they appeared at the DIT headquarters to provide legal counsel to their clients. The practice was protested to the Minister of Interior by the Board of Directors of the Bar Association during a meeting held on June 11. As of late October, sources reported that the DIT practice had ceased.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Guatemala's 1965 Constitution was replaced by the "Basic Statute of Government" after the 1982 military coup. Under the Basic Statute, all executive and legislative powers are vested in the head of state, General Oscar Humberto Mejia Victores, and all Government officials serve at his pleasure.

In May, the President of the Guatemalan Supreme Court, Ricardo Sagastume, was dismissed by the Chief of State. The ex-Chief Justice claimed that, among other reasons, he was removed for opposing military interference in the courts. Several other Supreme Court officials and justices resigned in sympathy following Sagastume's removal. His summary dismissal was protested by the Guatemalan Lawyers Association which issued a public statement declaring, in part, that the act "demonstrates once again the lack of independence of the judiciary."

Overt military interference in the courts' operation has declined in recent months, according to authoritative observers. As a practical matter, however, the removal of the Supreme Court President has served to remind all judicial officers of the need to respond to indications of special interest in particular cases by high government or military officials.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence.

The Basic Statute guarantees the inviolability of the home, and of personal correspondence and private papers. Prior to August 1983, the State of Exception then in force allowed the Government to restrict freedom of movement, examine correspondence and private papers, and conduct warrantless searches of private residences. During 1984 the Government continued to set up roadblocks in the interior to check documents of travelers and search vehicles for security reasons. Occasionally, security forces have entered homes without warrants in search of guerrilla safehouses or arms caches.

Charges that private correspondence is tampered with continue to be made. Postal authorities acknowledge that this sometimes happens and blame dishonest employees; several postal employees were arrested in 1984. There have also been allegations of mail opened for security or political reasons.

There is no organized system of Government informers or neighborhood watch committees in the urban areas. However, the civil defense patrols in the countryside have served as a means of reasserting government control. Guerrilla groups have killed a number of persons in rural areas whom they accused of being informers. The involvement of large segments of the rural population obviously contributes to the Government's knowledge regarding movement of citizens, an important function of the patrol in countering the insurgency.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Government affirms these rights, and no major abuses were reported in 1984, nor was there indication of any attempt to prevent the media from freely airing diverse viewpoints and covering the spectrum of political opinion during an election year.

This situation contrasts sharply with that of recent years when the media, newspaper reporters, and broadcast journalists in particular were frequent targets of political violence from all extremes. Lingering fears serve to limit press freedoms somewhat today. While opposition views and even criticism of the Government are printed and aired freely, with broad-gauged editorial opinions in daily newspapers, journalistic self-restraint results in only perfunctory coverage of such topics as military and national security, corruption, police investigations, and some judicial proceedings. Journalists are not prevented from entering or covering newsworthy events in conflict zones, but they rarely do. Guerrilla organizations and civil rights groups have access to the media through communiques and manifestos; the Government no longer prevents their publication, as it did in past years.

Local reporters are more apt to characterize their inattention to certain stories as a generalized or traditional lack of investigative journalism skills, rather than the bowing to any outside pressure. In the case of foreign journalists, there were incidents reported in 1984 involving two American wire service stringers who may have been subject to harrassment by government officials and/or private security forces as a result of their own news investigations.

Radio is Guatemala's most pervasive medium, with over 100 privately owned stations operating throughout the country. The Government owns and operates six radio stations and one television station which broadcast a variety of news, educational, and entertainment programs. There are four privately owned television stations, plus one religious (evangelical) station, and two independent television news programs. Six major independent daily newspapers are published in the capital; the Government publishes one daily with official announcements/decrees and selected national news items.

There is no censorship of either local or foreign books in Guatemala, but a few local writers and artists continue to live and work in self-exile outside the country. The main campus of San Carlos University in the capital has been a center of political violence in recent years, but the number of persons associated with the university who were victims of disappearances and killings in 1984 declined slightly with respect to previous figures.

GUATEMALA

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Basic Statute of Government affirms the rights of petition, assembly, and political association. Through the end of April 1984, some 41 political groups registered and attempted to meet the requirements set by the electoral law regulating the organization of political parties. Of that number, 20 met all requirements and participated in the July 1, 1984 Constituent Assembly elections, which international observers characterized as free and honest. Throughout the electoral campaign, the freedom of political assembly was respected by the Mejia Government and only scattered incidents of interference with the political process by officials at the local level were reported.

The Basic Statute of Government recognizes the right of workers to organize and strike in conformity with the labor code, which requires a process of negotiations and conciliation before a legal walkout can take place. These procedures often make it difficult to call a legal strike. According to Government statistics, some 645 labor unions are legally recognized by the Ministry of Labor; of this number, 381 are active. The balance are inactive largely as a result of repression by the Lucas Garcia Government (1978-82) and the continuing economic difficulties. Less than 10 percent of the Guatemalan labor force is currently organized.

Trade union organization is basically divided into two types; legally recognized and active centrals, and underground centrals. The largest and most significant labor central in Guatemala is the Confederacion de Unidad Sindical Guatemalteca (CUSG), which was recognized by the Government in November, 1983. CUSG is a democratic confederation that follows the principles of the free trade union movement and emphasizes economic unionism. In mid-1984 it consisted of twelve urban and rural trade union federations with approximately 165,000 members.

The Federacion Autonoma Sindical de Guatemala (FASGUA), the trade union arm of the Guatemalan Communist Party, with some 6,500 members, and the Central de Trabajadores (CNT), a Marxist-dominated ad hoc group of union locals without legal recognition, representing about 4,000 members, comprise the "political underground" unions in Guatemala. In May 1984, FASGUA and CNT formed the Coordinating Committee of Organizations for National Syndicalist Unity (CONUS). Although locals affiliated with either FASGUA, CNT, or CONUS are often active in labor disputes, these three parent groups are not particularly active within Guatemala. However, they do issue press bulletins and manifestos outside the country.

Aside from trade unions, there are numerous professional and trade associations in Guatemala. These groups operate autonomously, without Government interference and often exercise considerable political influence.

During the first 6 months of 1984, 11 leaders of left wing or unrecognized unions either were murdered or disappeared. Of the latter group, two later reappeared. Seven leaders of recognized unions were also abducted but were released after a short time.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Basic Statute of Government recognizes the individual's right to freedom of conscience and to the free exercise of religion. These rights are respected in practice. The Statute also grants legal recognition to all denominations.

More than 70 percent of the population adheres to the Roman Catholic faith. Many Indians, however, practice religion which combines Roman Catholic tenets with elements of the traditional Mayan religion. Evangelical churches have grown rapidly, especially among Indians, and their followers number about one quarter of the population. In addition, there is a small Jewish community.

There has been active proselytizing and religious work in the country by foreign Catholic clergy and religious workers. Foreign Protestant evangelical clergy remained in the country after General Mejia came to power. They have been joined in their efforts by local representatives of Guatemala's growing evangelical movement. A result of this religious mix and zeal has been some tension between Catholics and Protestants. Although authorities deny any deliberate policy of discrimination, evangelicals nevertheless have charged cases of intimidation by the national police.

Neither Catholics nor evangelicals have registered claims that they cannot preach the gospel or develop congregations, but some Protestants have complained of unequal treatment in certain matters. For example, they have claimed that land owned by the Government is available to them only at extremely inflated prices and that aid items, such as clothing from foreign charitable organizations and affiliated church groups, are subject to duties not levied on the Catholic Church. Others maintain very good relations with authorities and report excellent cooperation by government officials.

In 1984 the Catholic Church exercised the freedom of conscience provided by government statute as it took outspoken stands on human rights issues. The hierarchy issued a pastoral letter in June which called for the disbanding of the civil defense patrols because of the time and effort taken away from the pursuit of their families' livelihood. The letter also called for respect of human life, protection of the family, and freedom to speak, organize and move about openly. Separately, the Archbishop registered to vote and urged all citizens to exercise their franchise in the Constituent Assembly elections. In October he spoke out again, stating that the freedom to exercise one's rights was being impeded. Despite these frank criticisms, the Archbishop did acknowledge that the human rights situation in Guatemala had visibly improved. The Government's response to the Archbishop was to say that officers responsible for actions outside of the law had been discharged or brought before the courts. The church and Government have maintained regular contacts, including at the highest levels, which are described by both sides as cordial.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Government does not limit the freedom of movement of its citizens within the national territory. There are no restrictions on foreign travel or on the right to reenter the country. All citizens are free to migrate to other countries.

In early 1984, international organizations assisting refugees estimated that some 46,000 Guatemalan refugees, mostly Indians from areas affected by insurgent activities, had sought refuge in Mexico, primarily in the border areas of the State of Chiapas. Since 1982, the Government has followed a policy of encouraging the voluntary repatriation of all refugees and assisting their reintegration into the country. Following a general decline in guerrilla activity, and the decision by Mexico to relocate the refugees away from the border, refugees began to return to Guatemala, mostly in small groups. The Government has welcomed them and provided assistance for their return to their former homes, or in cases where their homes were destroyed during the insurgency, to one of the model towns in the "Polos de Desarrollo" (rural resettlement program).

In addition to the refugees who sought haven in Mexico, a major by-product of the insurgency was the internal displacement of as many as 400,000 persons during the past three years. Both Government and private agencies working with displaced persons agree that the actual number is now substantially below that figure. Various government programs have resulted in assistance to almost all the displaced and the permanent resettlement of the majority.

Following a pattern that began under the Rios Montt Government in 1982, Guatemalans living in voluntary exile continued to return to the country in 1984. This trend was further encouraged by the successful Constituent Assembly elections. Representatives of the major political party in exile, the Social Democrats, have visited the country as a public prelude for their return.

Exiles from other countries in the region have sought and been granted asylum during the past year.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Guatemala continued to be ruled throughout 1984 by a de facto military-controlled Government which took power following a coup on August 8, 1983. General Oscar Humberto Mejia Victores was elevated to the position of Chief of State, while retaining the dual function of Minister of Defense. He governs with the advice and consent of a Council of Military Commanders through a Cabinet of Ministers composed of both military officers and civilians.

On January 19, 1984, the Mejia Government convoked the election of a Constituent Assembly to take place on July 1, 1984. Under the direction of an autonomous Supreme Electoral Tribunal, established during the previous Government and composed of reputable civilians, and a subordinate Citizen's Registry, some 17 political parties and 3 additional department civic committees completed requirements to contest the elections. Some 1,157 candidates ran for the 88-seat Constituent Assembly, and 2,554,000 citizens, out of an estimated 3.5 million eligible, registered to vote.

The elections took place as scheduled with over 72 percent of the registered citizens casting ballots. Nine parties, including two running in coalition and one civic committee, won seats. International observers from nine countries and the Organization of American States were present throughout the country on election day and, without exception, testified to the openness and honesty of the process.

The mandate of the Assembly is to draft a new constitution and new laws of habeas corpus, elections, and protection of constitutional rights. The Assembly, inaugurated on August 1, 1984, was considering a draft of the new constitution at the end of December, after studying proposals from various sectors including universities, the Lawyers Guild, and political parties. The timetable for completion of the constitution and related laws is early 1985. Chief of State Mejia has stated publicly on various occasions that his Government will guarantee free and open national elections, and will hand over power to the winners in 1985. Parties of all democratic tendencies will be able to participate in the national elections, including those which return from exile, provided they are able to meet the requirements of the new electoral law.

Section 4 Government Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights.

The Government maintained an open door to visits by human rights groups during 1984, but few came in comparison to the previous year. The Government continued to cooperate with the United Nations Human Rights Commission's Special Rapporteur on Guatemala, Viscount Colville of Culross, who visited in August 1984, following earlier visits in June and November 1983. He met with the Chief of State, the Foreign Minister, Supreme Court and Constituent Assembly presidents, representatives of labor organizations and political parties, and traveled to interior locations. In public statements, Lord Colville stated that he found the situation in the interior to be tense, and guerrillas still active. He praised the honesty of the July 1 Constituent Assembly elections, but expressed concern over continued violence, shootings, and kidnappings. He was further quoted as stating "I consider that human rights have improved, even though there has been a small escalation during recent months (of incidents)." The formal report of his latest visit was issued in late October. On December 7, 1984, the United Nations Human Rights Commission adopted a resolution on the situation of human rights in Guatemala which, while noting the report of the Special Rapporteur and welcoming several positive developments, was generally critical. The U.S. Government opposed the resolution as unbalanced in that it appeared to apply only to the Guatemalan Government and ignored violations committed by the guerrilla insurgents. The U.S. did support the extension of the mandate of the Special Rapporteur.

The Regional Delegate of the International Committee of the Red Cross visited in March 1984. He was received by senior civilian and military officials of the Government.

The Government expressed sharp objection to a report issued in September by the Inter-American Human Rights Commission (IAHRC). The IAHRC charged that since the advent of the Mejia Government, death squads have reappeared, bodies are found along roadsides, and "more than 600 persons have been killed among other violations." The IAHRC also denounced the judicial system as "dependent, subordinate and submissive to the Executive," and for its failure effectively to apply habeas corpus. The Foreign Minister publicly announced that Guatemala had sent a letter to the Commission pointing out mistakes in the report. He noted that the Government had invited the Commission to visit one year ago but it did not accept, and that the observations in the report were made without an on-site visit. The letter argued that the IAHRC report was based on "accusations made, often by groups supportive of the subversive movement that seeks through violence and terror to institute a Marxist-Leninist regime in the country." Mentioned as one such group was the Mexican-based Guatemala Human Rights Commission. The letter also noted the failure of the IAHRC to mention the report of the United Nations Special Rapporteur.

After many years of concern regarding the application by Guatemala of the Conventions of Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Campaign and on Abolition of Forced Labor, the International Labor Organization's Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations in its 1984 report noted "with satisfaction" that the state of exception which had suspended trade union activities was over and that a process of democratization had begun which would also lead to the reestablishment of freedom of association. The Committee noted that a draft legislative decree had been prepared which would meet all the concerns previously raised by the ILO. The Committee requested the ILO to assist the Guatemalan Government in the rapid elaboration and adoption of the decree.

In Amnesty International's 1984 report entitled "Torture in the Eighties", the section on Guatemala states that "under successive regimes during the period under review, opponents or suspected opponents of the Government have been systematically seized without warrant, tortured and murdered." The report contains no reference to events beyond August 1982. An Amnesty bulletin released in March 1984 focused on alleged violations of human rights of faculty and students at the National University, and blamed government security forces for detentions and disappearances during the period July 1978 to August 1983. In its yearly report for 1984, a summary of 1983 analysis, Amnesty charged that "forces acting under government orders or with official complicity continue being responsible for a massive violation of human rights." Amnesty spoke of a notable increase in "death squads"-style disappearances and extrajudicial executions in Guatemalan cities during the 1983 period, yet observed that there were fewer such executions of non-combatant civilians in government-controlled rural areas, excepting an increase of abuses in areas still in contention. Both the Rios Montt and Mejia Governments have publicly stated that Amnesty International is free to visit Guatemala to observe conditions first hand. Amnesty's response in the past has been that it is awaiting a formal written reply to a communication it sent that would constitute a formal invitation.

A subcommittee of the American Bar Association, in a July 1984 letter, took issue with a Guatemalan Government circular communication claiming the existence of an "international campaign to discredit the interests of the people of Guatemala." The Association called on the Guatemalan Government to take a series of steps to improve fundamental rights.

GUATEMALA

A memorandum issued in September by the Americans for Democratic Action classified the human rights situation in Guatemala as "very complex", noting that there appear to be fewer violations in the countryside but an increase in urban disappearances. It observed that "a fair election with the participation of the left is considered by many the best hope for resolving the long Guatemalan nightmare."

The "Group of Mutual Support for the Reappearance, With Their Lives, of Our Children, Spouses, Parents and Siblings" came into being in 1984 and has received support from the International Peace Brigades based in Canada. Composed of approximately 150 persons, the group has requested government help in efforts to locate missing relatives. Representatives of the group have met with many sectors in Guatemala, sponsored a mass at the metropolitan Cathedral in August, and a peace march through the capital in October. Government officials have met with the group and allowed the march, which took place without incident. In December, the group met with General Mejia who announced a tripartite commission would be formed to investigate the cases of missing persons.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Guatemala's population topped 8 million in 1984, but only a small portion enjoys a high standard of living. Though there is a small and growing middle class, the majority of the population lives in the countryside, working small farms, hiring out during the harvests of the export crops, or engaging in cottage industry. The Guatemalan economy has been in recession since 1980; thus while the population has been growing at an annual rate of 3.1 percent, per capita income declined from $1,141 in 1981 to $1,128 in 1982. The recession has forced the Government to cut back sharply its public investment program. Political instability in Central America, low commodity prices in world markets, and the disruptive effects of the insurgency on internal demand have restricted improvements in unemployment and underemployment levels, which according to official figures are above 8 and 32 percent respectively.

In 1977, the latest year for which there are statistics, the caloric supply available for consumption was 92.2 percent of nutritional requirements. Notwithstanding considerable public investment in potable water projects, medical centers, and clinics, health services and sanitation are generally poor in rural areas, where available at all. In 1976, again the latest year for which figures are available, 40 percent of the total population, but only 14 percent of those living in rural areas, had access to safe drinking water. Life expectancy at birth rose from 58.9 years in 1981 to 60.99 years in 1984, but the infant mortality rate has risen from 62 per 1,000 live births in 1983 to 63 in 1984. In 1977, 21 percent of the urban population and 25 percent of the rural population were below the absolute poverty level.

The adult literacy rate was estimated at 46 percent in 1973 with males 53.6 percent and females 38.5 percent; the adult urban population was 71.8 percent, and the adult rural population 31.4 percent. As of 1980, the enrollment in primary school (as a percentage of primary school aged children) was 68.47 percent with males 73.73 percent and females 63 percent. Since half the population of Guatemala are comprise Indians, who learn Spanish as a second language, literacy is a particularly difficult problem. To attack it and address the educational needs of the Indian populace, the Government has developed a bilingual language program.

Population growth and economic development as well as other pressures are resulting in a slow shift of some Indians away from total identification with traditional Indian society, but the incorporation of the rural Indian population into the political, economic, and social mainstream of the modern sector will remain a long, difficult process, complicated by the longstanding, traditional animosities between the Indians and the ladinos. The Mejia Government is concerned about the resettlement of displaced highland Indians on their own lands and their return to agricultural self-sufficiency after the dislocation suffered as a result of civil conflict. Personnel working with the Salvation Army have said that based on their current knowledge the number of affected persons reported in earlier surveys (approximately 400,000) was greatly overestimated. Many displaced families rather rapidly re-established themselves on or near their lands and are again working their fields. The current official estimate of persons geographically displaced from their lands and living elsewhere in the country is around 8,500.

Encouraged by the large number of people who had returned to their lands, but who needed greater protection, the Government devised and put into action a model town plan known as the "Poles of Development." The program is a joint civilian/army effort to reconstruct and resettle 19 villages on or near their original sites. The towns each have a potable water supply and electricity, at least one school, a church, postal and telegraph service, private bus service, and a small army stockade nearby. All families will be given title to their homes. Access is not controlled. The military offer protection from insurgents. Thus far, nine villages have been completed and are inhabited.

Guatemala is a Latin society in which most women play traditional roles; there is no discrimination against women by law, but de facto discrimination is rooted in centuries of cultural practice.

Although figures show that over one-half the female population has not been educated and that 94 percent of the women residing in rural areas had less than three years of schooling in 1978, it is estimated that 30 percent of the students enrolled in Guatemalan universities are women. They generally study education, law, humanities, business administration, pharmacy, and psychology and go on to careers as health workers, teachers, or office workers. The number of women occupying professional and managerial positions is nevertheless small.

A few women university graduates have risen to high positions. General Mejia appointed Lic. Eugenia Tejada de Putzeys as Minister of Education, making her Guatemala's first woman Cabinet minister, and a woman heads the National Tourism Office. A woman also served in the dual role of Dean of the Law Faculty at Rafael Landivar and as a member of Guatemala's Supreme Court (from which she resigned following the replacement of Chief Justice Sagastume in May). Other women serve as judges of lower courts, principally in the area of family law. The Ministry of Labor established an Office of

Women's Affairs which has responsibility for encouraging the advancement of women.

While the participation of women in politics has been limited, 1984 witnessed a stirring of overt enthusiasm and organizational effort. In the July 1 Constituent Assembly elections three women were elected to the new 88-member Assembly. Only three other women had been elected to National Congress in the previous 35 years, and none to past Constituent Assemblies.

The Vice President of the Guatemalan Journalism Association, a woman, is an active contributor to the Association's work, which includes input to the Constituent Assembly. Their predominance in the textile industry has led one woman to be chosen Secretary General of the National Federation of Textile Workers.

GUYANA

Guyana is a small, poor country dominated by President Forbes Burnham and his People's National Congress (PNC) party. The PNC came to power in the British-supervised elections of 1964, the last unquestionably free elections held in Guyana. Constitutionally, Guyana is a republic with an executive president, parliament, independent judiciary and a multi-party system. Since independence in May 1966, President Burnham and his party have increasingly consolidated political power through elections in 1968, 1973 and 1980, which many Guyanese believe were tainted by fraud and the intimidation of political opponents.

Guyana is a multi-racial society where, for the most part, ethnic groups live in tolerance and harmony. Nevertheless, race has played a significant role in determining affiliation with political parties. Party affiliation has tended to be based more on race than on ideology. Although many members of the Indo-Guyanese community claim that the Government discriminates against them on racial grounds, Indo-Guyanese continue to dominate the commercial life of the country. The PNC has drawn its support primarily from Afro-Guyanese, who comprise about forty-three percent of the population and are largely urban dwelling.

The PNC, declaring itself a socialist party based on Marxist principles, claims it wants to make Guyana a non-aligned, socialist, cooperative republic. In 1974 President Burnham declared the supremacy of his party over all other Guyanese institutions.

The main opposition party, the People's Progressive Party (PPP), is an orthodox, pro-Moscow Marxist-Leninist party. The PPP, headed by former premier Dr. Cheddi Jagan, draws its support from Indo-Guyanese, who comprise fifty-one percent of the population. Although its appeal may have lessened, given a chance to compete fully and freely with the PNC in fair elections, the PPP could still be a force to be reckoned with in Guyana.

The United Force (UF) and the Democratic Labour Movement (DLM) are small parties espousing democracy and free enterprise. The Working People' Alliance (WPA) is a small multi-ethnic opposition political party which "aspires to be Marxist-Leninst." It has not yet opted to participate in elections which it claims would be rigged in favor of the PNC.

In 1984, the Government showed some degree of heightened sensitivity to human rights when government media commented on the "1983 Country Report on Human Rights Practices" in Guyana. These comments were primarily critical of the report. Another new development was that several members of the police force were charged with the killing of suspects held in police custody. Off-setting these improvements were continued infringements on the freedoms of press and assembly and harassment of the opposition.

GUYANA

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

No politically motivated killings occurred in 1984. However, opponents of the Government have charged that at least sixteen individuals, including some escaped prisoners and wanted men, were killed in confrontations with the police in 1984. The police claim to have shot them in self-defense. Political opponents of the PNC called for police to hold inquests into these deaths but have not claimed that these killings were politically motivated. In April 1984, two members of the police force were charged with manslaughter in the death of a young man who died of injuries sustained while in police custody. Another policeman was charged with murder in the shooting death of a 24 year old man in July 1984.

b. Disappearance

There were no politically motivated disappearances, clandestine detentions, or abductions in 1984.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Although mistreatment of suspected criminals by police continued in 1984, there is no evidence to suggest that senior officers condone these pactices, and torture is not used as a deliberate tool of political control. However, authorities have not responded publicly to allegations that torture and mistreatment take place, and the frequency and detail of the allegations suggest a serious decline in discipline and standards in the Guyana police force, which has been conceded by senior officials. The Guyana Human Rights Association alleged for example that in April 1984, while being held in police custody in Mabaruma in connection with the theft of some smuggled goods, an Amerindian was subjected to "electric torture and an especially severe beating after which he collapsed." The report did not suggest that Government authorities condoned the conduct of the police, nor did it assert that the case was politically motivated. However, another report by the Association concerning detainees who were questioned about an alleged plot against President Burnham stated that the detainees claimed to have been transferred to various detention centers blindfolded, never being allowed to see the persons in charge of them or those who interrogated them or brought them food. Several of the detainees further alleged that they were "physically assaulted" by the police and that they were the victims of "psychological torture," their heads being covered by cloth bags while a gun was fired close to their ears.

Physical conditions within prisons have deteriorated in recent years. Jails are said to be filthy and overcrowded. Prison diets are alleged to be inadequate.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention or Exile

The National Security Act authorizes searches without a warrant and preventive detention for up to three months without charges. Both ordinary citizens and members of the political opposition have been detained for brief periods without charges being stated or on charges of doubtful validity. The ensuing litigation is time-consuming and expensive. Although courts frequently dismiss charges with obvious political motivations, the Government tries to use the legal system, including the police, for political purposes. The arrest of Paul Nehru Tennassee, President of the Democratic Labor Movement, a minor political party, at the Timehri International Airport is a graphic example of such efforts. Tennassee was eventually convicted of failing to list forty Guyana dollars (US$ 11) on his currency declaration. However, during the five days he was held by police (until the hearing on a writ of habeas corpus) Tennassee was questioned about an alleged plot to assassinate or overthrow President Burnham.

According to the Guyana Human Rights Association, early in 1984, five unidentified Guyanese were detained for up to a week without their whereabouts being made known to relatives or lawyers. All were questioned about an alleged plot against President Burnham. They were released without any charges being filed against them.

There have been no summary exiles from Guyana. The right of habeas corpus is provided in the Guyana Constitution. In practice, it is effective if and when it can be employed through access by a detainee to friendly parties.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

As a former British Colony, Guyana maintains a British common law system and legal procedures, and almost all of the members of Guyanese judiciary were trained in the United Kingdom. Guyana has a functioning bail system, and defendants are accorded fair public trials and are represented by counsel. Timely charges are usually presented and appeals can be made to higher courts. There are no special courts for political security cases nor any political prisoners. In general, judges of high personal integrity sit on the bench. Despite insinuations by the opposition about the independence of the judiciary, less partisan lawyers regard the judiciary as fairly independent. It is possible to win in court against the Government. Opponents of the Government complain that some magistrates have been too zealous in enforcing the Government's economic policies, particularly those involving banned food imports. They charge that magistrates often hand out harsher sentences to individuals found guilty of these "economic crimes" than to individuals guilty of violent crimes against persons and property. Magistrate Vernon Persaud was dismissed for refusing to sentence persons guilty of possessing contraband wheat flour. Wheat is not grown in Guyana, and by law it cannot be commercially imported.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Wiretaps, mail interception and physical surveillance are used to monitor and intimidate political opponents of the Government. Public sector employees, who constitute 51 percent of the work force, are frequently required to attend certain ruling party functions and allegedly coerced into working at Hope Estate, a government-owned coconut plantation, in order to keep their jobs. The Government's emphasis on agriculture in the schools has led to small school children doing physical labor in school agriculture plots.

GUYANA

Critics charge that authorities at Timehri International Airport are engaged in illegal random "body searches" of travelers, on suspicion of their violating foreign currency control regulations. The Guyana Human Rights Association has stated that this practice has no legal basis because, according to Guyana's exchange control legislation, police must have "reasonable grounds for suspicion." Police practices of searching an entire planeload of people or conducting "spot checks" may violate the law, but the constitutionality of body searches at exit points in Guyana has not been challenged in court.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Constitutionally, the Government affirms freedom of speech and press but in fact, it controls the media both directly through ownership and indirectly through control of the importation of newsprint. The Government presents its views in the government-owned "Guyana Chronicle" and the ruling party's "New Nation." Opposition viewpoints are freely expressed without prior censorship in the several weekly papers published by opponents of the Burnham Government. However, the Government allocates to its papers a disproportionate amount of the scarce newsprint imported into the country, and disallows increased importation of paper, even if no foreign exchange is required. It has also used libel suits against opposition newspapers which are drawn out over an extended period to intimidate them.

Guyanese can receive printed materials from abroad, but foreign exchange is generally not available for subscriptions to foreign publications. "The Caribbean Contact," a monthly regional newspaper which is published in Barbados and which is generally hostile to the Burnham Government, is sold locally without any restrictions.

The Government owns the country's only radio station, the Guyana Broadcasting Corporation, which broadcasts the BBC World News Service twice daily. Foreign stations can be heard on shortwave or mediumwave. Some radio interview programs allow public criticism of the Government.

The Government asserts that state-owned media should serve "developmental" needs. As a result, the government media seldom run items unfavorable to it and news gathering efforts are limited by journalistic self-censorship. Objective reporting has occasionally cost journalists jobs within the government-owned media.

The Guyana News Agency (GNA) edits items which the government media receives from wire services. However, since the Soviet news agency "TASS" installed a teletype machine at the headquarters of the "Guyana Chronicle" and GNA, much of what has appeared in the government-owned press has been actual TASS and Cuban Prensa Latina wire service articles. This extends even to articles about U.S. domestic affairs.

The Government record on academic freedom is mixed. Several opposition Working People's Alliance leaders teach at the University of Guyana, and opposition parties have organized student groups there. However, some teachers critical of the Government's educational policies have been summarily fired without explanation.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution guarantees freedom of assembly and association. In general, individuals can freely associate, although under the Public Order Act, police permits are required for public political meetings. At his discretion, the police commissioner can refuse permission for a meeting without any apparent legal requirement for him to state a reason for refusal. Opposition political parties have occasionally been denied permission to hold public meetings, particularly in Linden, the center of the bauxite mining industry. Both the Peoples Progressive Party and the Working Peoples Alliance have had meetings disrupted by the police or by thugs believed connected to the ruling party.

Workers in Guyana are free to join unions. During 1984, a number of unions in Guyana exercised the right to strike, predominately in the government-owned sugar industry. Although the Government has the authority to declare any strike "political or illegal" it has not exercised that right since 1977, but the mere existence of the authority has an intimidating effect upon independent trade union activity. The Trade Union Congress (TUC) is the umbrella organization for the Guyana labor movement with responsibility for centralized collective bargaining. Until recently, a majority of the unions in the TUC were pro-Government, and these unions have had disproportionate voting power in electing the executive board of the TUC. However, at the 1984 annual TUC conference in October, independent and opposition union leaders defeated the pro-government slate of candidates and elected a number of their leaders to key TUC positions. The election also left the TUC, which had been given far reaching powers to bargain collectively for all unions by the Labour Amendment Act of March 1984, in the hands of union leaders who were generally opposed to the legislation. In November 1984, President Burnham weakened the new leadership by pre-empting TUC negotiations for wage increases of public sector employees when he unilaterally determined and announced an increase in wages. That same month, pro-government unions walked out of the TUC annual delegate conference.

The 1984 Labour Amendment Act presents a significant challenge to the traditional rights of trade unions to bargain collectively on behalf of their members. The Act made collective agreements binding in law; agreement between the Government and the TUC were made binding on all public sector employees, and on member unions, whether the respective unions were in favor of the agreement or not. The Act rendered void the appeals court decision which required the Government to pay back-wages to sugar workers by amending the Constitution to exclude "wages" from the definition of fundamental property rights protected by the Constitution. The constitutionality of the Labour Act is currently being challenged in court; arguments have been heard, and a decision is now awaited in the case.

Unions, trade assocations, private associations, and professional bodies are permitted freely to maintain relations with recognized international bodies in their fields, both public and private.

c. Freedom of Religion

There are no religious restrictions in Guyana; 57 percent of the population is Christian, 33 percent Hindu, and 9 percent Muslim. The Constitution guarantees freedom of thought and religion. There is no favored state religion, and foreign missionaries are permitted to enter the country to proselytize. Adherence to a particular faith does not confer any advantages in civil, political, economic, military or other secular status.

d. Freedom of Movement within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration and Repatriation

Freedom of movement within Guyana is guaranteed by the Constitution and is, in practice, usually permitted. However, since the colonial period, travel to certain Amerindian areas has required government permission. Sometimes permission has been withheld from opposition political figures, Catholic missionaries, foreign diplomats, and scholars, apparently on political grounds.

Although Guyanese are free to travel abroad, to emigrate, and to return to Guyana, opposition politicians have been stopped and searched at police roadblocks and upon entering or leaving the international airport. On October 25, 1983, the Government issued a directive that public servants would not be allowed to spend their leave overseas for reasons related to foreign currency shortages. Although these reasons may have been valid, some public servants saw the move as political--to halt the "brain drain." After a flurry of resignation letters, the directive was rescinded on November 1, 1983.

During 1984, no Guyanese had his citizenship revoked or his passport taken away for political reasons.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

President Forbes Burnham and a small group of senior officials rule Guyana, meeting in Cabinet sessions or in closed meetings of the ruling People's National Congress inner circle. In almost all matters, the President himself makes the final decision. The Burnham Government has ruled Guyana for twenty years, preserving the facade of parliamentary democracy without the substance. The Party has employed the government apparatus to advance its aims and to maintain political power in the hands of a ruling elite. Party loyalty is the road to advancement. Since the public sector employs over half the work force in Guyana, civil servants are reluctant publicly to criticize the Government, although most Guyanese freely voice their opinions in private.

Guyanese who are not members of the ruling party elite have been effectively denied meaningful participation in the decision-making processes of the state. Every election since 1964 has been marred by fraud and intimidation of the opponents of the Peoples National Congress Party. Opposition parties are able, albeit with some difficulty, to hold public political rallies, to organize, and to publish their newspapers. However, the majority of the people lack any effective means to register their support for political and economic changes. Many Guyanese perceive voting in general elections as a waste of time since results seem to be predetermined in favor of the PNC.

The opposition, though weak, fragmented, and largely ineffectual, has (with the exception of the Peoples Progressive Party) formed a loosely organized coalition to press the Government to hold free and fair elections under international supervision. However, there has been no sign that the Burnham Government would accept neutral international observers to witness the holding of general elections which constitutionally must be called in 1985.

Section 4 Government Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Burnham Government does not publicly admit to any human rights violations and regards outside criticism of its human rights practices as interference in its internal affairs. However, in 1984 Government media engaged in a critique of last year's edition of this Report as it related to Guyana. Guyanese comments ranged from outright denunciation to more moderate discussions of the Report's contents and conclusion.

Although visits by international human rights organizations have not been encouraged, they have been permitted. In 1982, Amnesty International sent observers to the trials of Donald Rodney, accused in the death of his brother, the leader of the Working People's Alliance, and of Ivan Sookram, a member of the Working Peoples Alliance, accused of training and arming a group for the overthrow of the Government. Rodney was convicted, and his case is pending further appeal. Meanwhile he has been granted political asylum in the United Kingdom. Sookram's case was dismissed by the courts and subsequently reinstitututed several times before he was finally acquitted.

The Guyana Human Rights Association (GHRA) is a non-governmental organization formed in late 1979 with support from trade unions, professional organizations and churches. The GHRA monitors human rights practices in Guyana and publishes periodic press releases and an annual report on human rights observance in Guyana. It gathers information from members, victims of human rights abuses, trade unionists, churchmen, other interested parties, official documents and newspapers. The Association has been quite effective in drawing international and regional attention to the human rights situation in Guyana. The GHRA claims that to preserve its objectivity, political activists are discouraged from holding executive positions. However, the government media have denounced the GHRA as an opposition entity, and the Government clearly is irritated by the GHRA's reporting. There has been no physical violence against human rights activists in Guyana. However, one prominent non-Guyanese member was fired from a teaching job at the University of Guyana without explanation.

Guyana has generally not been active in international human rights forums but has paid considerable attention to human rights in South Africa, and is a member of the "Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People."

GUYANA

In its 1983-84 Report, Freedom House rated Guyana as "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Guyana has a population of 794,000, estimated to be growing at the rate of 0.4 percent per year, although many observers believe that it is actually declining as a result of emigration. The Guyanese economy is comprised of public, private, and cooperative sectors, with the public sector dominating. Agriculture and mining are the most productive activities with sugar, rice, and bauxite accounting for over 80 percent of export earnings.

Currently the economic outlook for Guyana is bleak. Declining production, obsolete plant and equipment, emigration of skilled personnel, deteriorating social services, and the Government's tight control of the economy along with its self-proclaimed socialist policies have all contributed to the current economic malaise. The Guyanese economy experienced no growth during 1982 or 1983, the GNP declining ten percent a year in both years. Lower world market prices for Guyana's principal exports, relatively higher prices for essential imported goods such as petroleum, adverse weather conditions affecting rice and sugar production, and ineffective management have resulted in a continuing decline of Guyana's foreign exchange earnings and a reduction of the standard of living for most Guyanese. Guyana's dwindling foreign exchange earnings will decrease the country's capacity to import necessary raw materials, equipment, spare parts, fertilizers and insecticides, thereby further reducing production. In addition, business credit facilities have been closed off to local businessmen, as commercial and official debts remain unserviced. Unemployment is estimated at 25-30 percent. Inflation is estimated at 35 percent.

The Government is taking various actions to cope with the severe economic crisis. It has instituted a systen of foreign exchange allocations, whereby certain private and public corporations can retain a portion of their hard currency earnings in order to purchase raw materials and equipment. During 1984, the Government devalued the Guyanese dollar twice and announced that in the future it would use the exchange rate more flexibly as an instrument of economic policy. Negotiations to reach an agreement with the International Monetary Fund on a standby facility have occurred intermittently without success.

The deterioration in the provision of essential services such as water, electrity, santitation, and health care has not been reversed in 1984. Although Guyanese have a life expectancy at birth of 70 years, the infant mortality rate is 33.6 per 1000 live births.

The Government has not allocated sufficient funds to maintain the standards of what was previously the best educational system in the region. Many school buildings are in poor condition, text books and exercise books are in short supply, and the number of teachers has declined. In 1980, the adjusted primary school enrollment rate was 103 percent for males and 105 percent for females. In 1976, Guyana had an estimated adult literacy rate of 91.6 percent. Since 1975 the Government has had a formal policy of providing free education from nursery school to university, although it has proven too costly to fully fund.

The Government has been accused of politicizing education, which critics cite as a principal cause of declining educational standards. In a December 1984 edition of the Chronicle entitled "Moulding Students From an Early Age," the most important objectives of the future President's College were cited as "productive work habits, the cooperative ethic and an ideological commitment to socialism." Some teachers already selected to work at the school will undergo "special orientation and training" in Cuba.

Racially, the Guyanese population is divided into 51 percent East Indian, 43 percent African and mixed Africans, 4 percent Amerindian, and 2 percent European and Chinese. Despite complaints that the Government discriminates against nonsupporters of the ruling party, social services and employment in the public sector appear to be open to all in a nondiscriminatory fashion. However, in late 1984, Government raids of private business firms accused by the Government of selling illegally imported goods prompted some Indo-Guyanese to conclude that the raids were racially motivated.

The Burnham Government has emphasized the role of women in development and, in general, has acted to protect and promote women's rights. In 1983, the Government passed legislation to erase the stigma of illegitimacy in Guyanese society and to accord certain legal rights to the children of unwed mothers. President Burnham has appointed many women to governmental and party posts. Guyanese women are serving as government ministers, judges, magistrates, lawyers, doctors, teachers, diplomats and businesswomen. A woman was the Government's preferred candidate for the presidency of the Trade Union Congress. Afro-Guyanese women are among the principal supporters of the ruling party. Nevertheless, most women continue to occupy their traditional role as homemakers, and Guyana remains a male-dominated society.

Guyana's foreign exchange shortage has forced the Government to sharply curtail imports of many food items. The ban on imports of wheat flour and split peas, basic items in Guyanese diets, has been particularly unpopular. Since adequate supplies of substitute foods at reasonable prices are not readily available, this policy may have caused nutritional and dietary problems. Opponents allege that the Government's policy has resulted in an increase in child mortality from malnutrition-related causes. The Guyana Human Rights Association asserts that during the first seven months of 1984, 96 of the 176 children admitted to the Public Hospital Georgetown died, allegedly suffering from malnutrition. In general, defenders of the Government's food self-sufficiency policy argue that although there admittedly is a food distribution problem there is no shortage of food. Results of a 1982 international study on the extent of malnutrition in Guyana have not yet been processed and tabulated.

HAITI

Haiti has had a turbulent history characterized by alternating periods of authoritarian rule and political instability. Haiti's current ruler, Jean-Claude Duvalier, is the ninth president-for-life in Haitian history. The current president has eliminated such conspicuous violence as the killings and disappearances that marked the rule of his father, Francois Duvalier (1957-71). Although Haiti has made slow and inconsistent progress under Jean-Claude Duvalier toward greater respect for human rights, significant human rights abuses continue. Constitutionally guaranteed freedoms, such as freedom of speech, press, and association, are in practice effectively restricted by other legislation and laws. Due process guarantees relating to judicial procedures are often not respected.

Haiti remains the poorest country in the Western Hemisphere. Though the Government has instituted tax and budgetary reforms, Haiti's economic problems remain serious. The Government has actively sought foreign assistance from Western government and private organizations, and has succeeded in bringing more foreign economic assistance to Haiti.

Constitutionally, Haiti is a republic with executive authority vested in the President. The legislature is unicameral, with members elected for six-year terms. Although the judicial system is independent of the executive branch in theory, this is not the case in reality. In practice, all government powers are concentrated in the presidency. Article 136 of the 1983 Constitution names the President "guarantor of the independence of the judicial power." He also has the power to dissolve the legislature, and during the nine months when the legislature is not in session he rules by decree. Haiti's small regular military force and its militia - the Volunteers for National Security - play little or no direct role in the decision-making process.

In 1984, the Government made human rights progress in some areas but there were setbacks as well. In February, legislative elections were held. The elections attracted a record number of candidates, and two thirds of all incumbents were defeated. In some areas these were the freest elections to take place under the Duvaliers, but there were also abuses and interference by the Government. Some well-known opposition candidates were not allowed to participate, and in some localities the Government resorted to fraud or violence to ensure that government candidates won. In March, President Duvalier wrote public letters to the heads of the police, militia, armed forces, and the Ministers of Justice and the Interior calling on them to respect the law and human rights. These letters began a three-month period during which an atmosphere of liberalization existed. In late May, partly caused by economic conditions but also affected by the President's letters, riots broke out in a number of northern provincial towns. On June 18 the Government detained three prominent journalists for periods of up to 48 hours, one of whom was beaten in the presence of a Minister of State. Two of the three independent weekly publications ceased publication in June; one of these resumed publishing in August. On July 4, police detained Haiti's UNESCO Representative, Hubert De Ronceray, and attempted to detain oppositionist Sylvio Claude. De Ronceray and oppositionist Gregoire Eugene were placed under house arrest in July, but this was lifted in late September Claude remained in hiding, even though the Government had given assurances to foreign diplomats that he was free to return home. In September the Government brought to trial five persons who had been accused of participating in bombings in early 1983 and who had been held more than a year without charges. They were found guilty and sentenced to life imprisonment. One other detainee was released.

In early 1984 the hopes and expectations of many were raised by President Duvalier's March letters, a degree of greater press freedom, and other actions by the Government. The June-July crackdown then proved to be a setback. Late in 1984, however, the Government took some steps which began to recapture the February-May movement toward democratization. Nevertheless, the events of June 18 served as a vivid reminder that, at best, only a beginning has been made toward democratization in Haiti.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no reports of politically-motivated killings by the Government or opposition in 1984. Three persons died in late May when security forces opened fire to suppress riots in the northern city of Cap Haitian, but most objective observers believed that government forces had handled the incident with relative restraint.

b. Disappearance

There were no confirmed disappearances in 1984. Some reports of "disappearances" were received, but in all cases the person in question was ultimately accounted for.

c. Torture, and Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

In one case of torture, Pierre Robert Auguste, a journalist for an independent weekly, was detained by police June 18. During his questioning and in the presence of high ranking government officials, he was beaten with a wooden rod and one finger was broken. In July, Jocelyne Claude, daughter of oppositionist Sylvio Claude, was beaten about the head and body at her home by police attempting to locate her father. The practice of beatings, however, is not believed to be widespread. Most released prisoners report no abuse; international observers who visited Haitian prisons and detention centers in 1984 reported that those with whom they spoke indicated no physical mistreatment.

Prisoners and detainees are normally permitted to receive visitors, food, and medical treatment. However, particularly in the early stages of an arrest, or when prisoners are taken to the Casernes Dessalines barracks, prisoners are often kept in degrading circumstances, such as stripped to their underwear in crowded and unsanitary conditions. Visitors are often not allowed into the Casernes and food is not always provided. Dr. Hubert De Ronceray, detained from July 4-6 , was kept stripped in a small cell with no toilet facilities other than a small bucket. In the provinces, abusive treatment by local authorities is not uncommon. In February, in the town of Berrettes, a loan collector was allegedly beaten by a local official after objecting to the official's misappropriation of a loan payment. In Gonaives in May, one woman reportedly was beaten by the police authorities when she refused to be taken in for questioning. This beating was a contributing factor to the riots in that northern city.

President Duvalier's March letters called on government officials not to engage in abusive practices. The Government also increased the budget for the Ministry of Justice in 1985 and is attempting to make all officials aware of their responsibilities under the law.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Under the Haitian legal system, arrests must be based on a charge of violation of a law. A warrant is legally, though not in practice, necessary for arrest. Once a person has been taken into custody, the arresting authority is required by law to obtain a ruling on the validity of the arrest from a judge within 48 hours. Although this procedure is open to considerable abuse, there are indications that the Government has begun to adhere to it, at least in non-security, non-political cases.

Preventive detention is practiced most noticeably in cases related to political opposition acitivites and state security matters. In 1984 the Government detained a number of people for questioning about their political activities. Serge Beaulieu, the only independent candidate in the legislative elections, was detained in March. Three prominent journalists were detained on June 18, and some of their associates a few days later. In July, Hubert De Ronceray, a former minister and prominent social scientist was questioned.

All of the above were released within the 48 hour limit. However, persons detained for security or political reasons are often held incommunicado for indefinite periods. Five persons, all associates of Hubert De Ronceray, were picked up by security forces July 1 and not released until early October. Five associates of Sylvio Claude were arrested in late 1983 and have not yet been tried or released. There are others in the same situation; the total number of persons detained in Haiti without charge is not known. The Government released nine persons regarded as detainees in 1984.

Haitian law requires that charges against arrested persons be filed at least two weeks before a trial. In practice, this is often not the case. The law allows legal counsel for defendants. However, a client is sometimes not allowed to meet with counsel until immediately before the trial. There is no system of bail, though "provisional liberty" can be obtained in some cases. Expulsion of persons who pose a political challenge or security threat to the regime has been used frequently in the past. However, there are no reports of any expulsions in 1984. Gregoire Eugene, who was expelled along with other journalists and labor leaders in November 1980, was permitted to return to Haiti in February 1984.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Legally the Haitian judiciary is a separate institution. In practice, however, it does not operate independently of the executive branch. The accused are permitted counsel and to know the charges against them. Both juries and judicial tribunals are permitted to hear cases, render decisions, and impose sentences. Defendants have the right to appeal their conviction, which must be done within three days.

In September 1984 five persons who had been held without charges for over a year were tried for involvement in a series of politically motivated bombings in 1982 and 1983. Another person arrested was released for lack of evidence, and two persons believed to be in the U.S., were tried in absentia. The defendants were informed of the charges against them only about one week prior to the trial. The trial itself, which was public, lasted about 14 hours and was in accordance with Haitian legal procedure. Defense lawyers were permitted to call witnesses and generally mounted a strong defense. The defendants were able to testify on their own behalf. They claimed to be involved in smuggling narcotics, rather than attempting to overthrow the Government. All five were found guilty of "plotting against the security of the state" and were sentenced to life at hard labor. The defense has appealed.

Persons detained for political or security reasons in Haiti are seldom charged or brought to trial; some have been held for years. There may be as many as forty or fifty persons in this category in Haitian jails, though the actual number is probably lower. Amnesty International had earlier identified 21 political prisoners being held in Haiti. Some of them appear to have been released during 1984 and it is estimated that from eight to twenty-seven detainees are currently held because of political and/or security reasons.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Searches and monitoring of homes routinely take place without warrants or other judicial authorization. In late 1983 and early 1984 oppositionist Sylvio Claude was placed under house arrest. In July, Gregoire Eugene and Hubert De Ronceray were also placed under house arrest for about three months. This procedure is not legal under Haitian law except in times of national emergency. In July 1984, police entered Sylvio Claude's home without a warrant. Before leaving, they took Claude's printing press and copies of his magazine. A policeman struck Claude's daughter, Jocelyne, on the head with his gun.

A national militia, the Volunteers for National Security (VSN), performs security functions and serves as an informer system reporting on political opposition and threats to the regime. These forces are often poorly disciplined and sometimes abuse their local position through intimidation and interference in police and judicial activities. In his March 13 letter addressed to the militia, President Duvalier specifically called for an end to such practices, as well as to the abuse of power for extortive purposes. In October, the Government appointed a twelve-man commission--five of whom were non-VSN military officers--to oversee the VSN.

HAITI

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Article 40 of the Constitution of 1983 guarantees each citizen "the right to express his thoughts in all matters and by every means at his power." The press is actually governed by the 1980 press code, which requires that all publications be submitted for governmental review 72 hours prior to publication, that all journalists (including foreigners) be accredited by the Ministry of Information, and that no material critical of the Duvalier family be published. While the first two of these requirements are not always enforced, the spirit of the press code and governmental actions do serve to restrict freedom of the press.

In 1984, two independent publications, often critical of the Government, appeared for the first time; the new weeklies, L'Information and Fraternite joined the long-established independent weekly Le Petit Samedi Soir, in introducing an independent tone and editorial line seldom seen in recent years. Articles discussing pluralism, political parties, and the activities of oppositionists proliferated. Sylvio Claude's La Conviction, previously a clandestine newsletter, also appeared on the streets a couple of times, although the Government moved on legal grounds to prevent its distribution in May. In addition, the Catholic station, Radio Soleil, continued its outspoken commentary, denouncing election irregularities in February and speaking out on human rights during the course of the year. From January to June there was some movement toward a freer press in Haiti. On June 18, however, Haiti's fledgling independent press received a severe blow when the Government detained the publishers of the three independent weeklies. Subsequently, Fraternite's Gregoire Eugene was placed under house arrest for three months. L'Information and Fraternite ceased publishing after the incident, though L'Information reappeared in August. Both L'Information and Le Petit Samedi Soir adopted a milder editorial tone after the incident, though by October they had begun to recover some of their prior outspokenness. Fraternite has not appeared since June, when it featured an article by Eugene criticizing the constitutional provision for a presidency for life. There are several pro-government newspapers in addition to the official daily. The Government also owns a radio station and a television station. There is one private television station, and a number of private radio stations operate throughout the country. These exercise self-censorship and refrain from criticizing the Government.

Public criticism is allowed in discussions of the Haitian economy, international affairs, and Haitian history before 1957. Too strident a criticism of the present Government, and criticism of the President or the First Lady, however, is not tolerated. In June, a deputy delivered a speech in the National Assembly attacking high level corruption in the Government. The Government reacted by organizing a petition to recall the deputy; the deputy has since refrained from criticizing the Government. After Fraternite's Gregoire Eugene was detained on June 18, he was removed from his position as professor of constitutional law at the National University. Hubert De Ronceray's Center for Investigation of Social Studies was forced to suspend its activities after De Ronceray was detained in July.

Although foreign publications and broadcasts are received in Haiti, most publications are reviewed by the Government upon arrival to determine whether there are any articles critical of it. If there are, the offending publication is usually confiscated. Publications openly critical of the Government, such as those published by exile groups in the U.S., are not permitted to circulate in Haiti.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution grants Haitians the right to assemble peaceably and the right to form unions, political parties, and cooperatives. Haitian law requires that any public assembly of more than 20 persons have police authorization and that all formal organizations have governmental sanction. Professional, cultural, religious, trade, and similar non-political organizations operate freely in Haiti, and such organizations are free to maintain ties with related groups outside of Haiti. However, and in spite of the constitutional quarantees of the right to form political parties, the Government continues to ban activities by parties pending the passage of legislation to regulate the operation of political parties.

The Government took a number of important steps in 1984 to improve the situation of labor in Haiti. A federation of union workers of Haiti was founded January 12, 1984, with nine active unions in Port-au-Prince as charter members. The Federation, which represents 2500 workers, has assumed the leading role in union activity in Haiti. Under the sponsorship of the Federation, representatives from its nine affiliates develop joint resolutions to union problems and coordinate assistance to workers throughout Haiti who request aid in forming new unions. The Federation has invited representatives from the AFL-CIO and the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers to visit Haiti in the near future. The Government has publicly stated it does not object to international labor organizations visiting Haiti.

In March, the Government revised the labor code by making it easier for employees to form unions, protecting the right of Haitians who work abroad, and revising provisions on forced labor to comply with International Labor Organization conventions on forced labor. In May, Federation and union officials met with members of the ILO delegation and discussed the possibilities of international assistance. In June, for the first time in many years, the President of the Federation traveled to the ILO conference in Geneva as the labor union representative on the official Haitian delegation.

While limitations on labor activity continue to exist, such as de facto restrictions on the right to strike, the creation of a federation, the revised labor code, and other measures undertaken by the Government in 1984 have provided for an expansion of the role of labor in Haitian society.

c. Freedom of Religion

Roman Catholicism is the official religion of Haiti. Voodoo, a religion combining Christian and African animist elements, is also practiced by a majority of the population. Other religions are freely practiced; proselytizing, conversion, missionary activity, foreign ties, building of churches, and religious education and publishing all take place without government interference. In addition to the Protestant sects which are active throughout the country, non-Christian faiths, such as the Bahai and Judaism, are practiced in Haiti. There is no religious persecution or discrimination.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration and Repatriation

The Government does not generally restrict travel within Haiti for ordinary citizens or foreigners. A network of police checkpoints does exist throughout the country, and foreigners and inter-city transport vehicles are required to register before entering some towns. Persons are free to change their residence or place of work as they wish. In 1984 some critics of the Government were restricted in their movements within Haiti. Both Gregoire Eugene and Hubert De Ronceray were told after their house arrest was lifted they would have to seek police permission if they wished to leave the Port-au-Prince area. Foreign travel and the right to emigrate are unrestricted. Emigrants are free to return to Haiti, and many do so. Haitian exit and entry visa and passport regulations and fees do not generally impose an undue hardship on persons desiring to travel. Immigration officials at the international airport do maintain a list persons who may not enter or exit the country because of criminal, security, or political reasons. For the most part, political expellees in recent years have not been allowed to return to Haiti, although Gregoire Eugene was permitted to return in February after three years in exile.

Illegal emigration from Haiti continued to increase in 1984. In accordance with the U.S.-Haitian bilateral agreement on migrant interdiction, 2,501 migrants were returned to Haiti by the U.S. Coast Guard in 1984. This represents fully 73 percent of all migrants returned (3,415) over the 39-month life of the 1981 interdiction agreement. Based on the migrants' own statements, U.S. immigration officers determined that all were intending economic migrants and ineligible for refugee status. Embassy officers have inteviewed one fifth of all interdictees as part of the continuing program to monitor the treatment of repatriated migrants. These interviews generally take place within six months of the return of the attempting illegal migrant. None of the interdictees reported official mistreatment or harassment by Haitian officials as a result of their attempt to emigrate. In accordance with the agreement, the Haitian Government has not prosecuted nor arrested any repatriates for their illegal departure. However, also in accordance with the agreement, the Government has arrested several persons suspected of organizing clandestine voyages, persons crewing such vessels, and persons found in possession of illegal drugs.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Haiti is ruled by President-for-Life Jean-Claude Duvalier, assisted and counseled by a small group of advisors. The Constitution grants the President the right to name the cabinet and all important officials (in the executive and judiciary) and to designate his own successor, all without legislative approval. When the legislature is not in session, the President can make laws by decree. The 1984 legislature was virtually powerless and followed the lead of the President. Legislative elections were held in February 1984. On the positive side, there were a record number of candidates and, in some districts, these were the freest elections under the Duvaliers. However, the Government did not allow such opposition leaders as Sylvio Claude and Gregoire Eugene to participate in the process, and in some districts the Government interfered with the process to ensure that its candidate won through intimidation and altering of the results. In general, however, these elections were less flawed than either the 1983 municipal elections or the 1979 legislative elections.

There are no officially recognized political parties in Haiti. In May, the Government announced that it would submit to the National Assembly legislation to regulate the operation of political parties, but would continue to ban political activity by political parties until the law was passed. Although it was not submitted to the legislature in 1984, in October President Duvalier announced the establishment of a commission to examine the first draft of such a law.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government is sensitive to its international image in human rights matters. In recent years the Government has augmented its cooperation with international human rights organizations. In June 1984, the Government allowed an International Committee of the Red Cross representative to visit prisoners in Haiti's jails. The representative was able to visit prisoners in the Port-au-Prince national penitentiary as well as the Casernes Dessalines. In October, the representative returned to Haiti and gave President Duvalier a list of recommendations for improvement of the conditions of prisoners in Haitian jails.

During the past year the Government has sought to develop a closer working relationship with the International Labor Organization (ILO). An ILO mission visited Port-au-Prince in May to consider a Government request for new ILO technical cooperation programs. The team met with officials from several ministries, labor unions, the labor federations and international donor organizations. The Government and ILO are engaged in a continuing dialogue concerning Haiti's requests for increased technical assistance and the situation of labor in Haiti.

Two human rights organizations operate in Haiti. The first is the government-sponsored National Human Rights Commission created in 1982. The nine-member Commission meets to investigate citizens' complaints of government abuses. However, the Commission has only advisory powers and does not get involved in "political" cases (Claude, Eugene, De Ronceray). The Commission usually acknowledges receipt of requests from international human rights organizations, but does not respond to all. The Haitian Human Rights League, founded by a local attorney and educator in 1979, is affiliated with the International Federation of the Rights of Man. While articles by individual members of the League appear in the local press, the League was not active in 1984. In September the League published a communique in the local press praising the Government for bringing to trial five individuals accused of participating in a bombing incident in 1983 and calling on the Government to lift the house arrest of Gregoire Eugene and Hubert De Ronceray.

There were other visits of international human rights groups in 1984. A representative of the Lawyers' Committee for International Human Rights visited Haiti in January and met with Sylvio Claude--who was under house arrest at that time--and government officials. Representatives from the United Nations Human Rights Commission also visited Haiti in January and were received by government officials. In September, three representatives of the Committee to Protect Journalists came to Haiti to investigate the June 18 arrests of the three publishers. They met with journalists and government officials.

Freedom House rates Haiti as "not free". Amnesty International's 1984 report (which covered events during 1983) focused on allegations of torture and other forms of mistreatment of prisoners, detention without trial, including unacknowledged detention for long periods of political prisoners, and cases of disappearances.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Haiti is the poorest and, in most terms, least developed nation in the Western Hemisphere with an annual GNP per capita of about $300. A small elite and a growing middle class in Port-au-Prince control most of the wealth of the country, while 78 percent of the rural population and more than half of the urban population exist in dire poverty. Such extreme poverty has caused massive migration from Haiti. Foreign remittances, estimated to exceed $50 million per year, are a crucial element of survival for many families.

Haiti's population is estimated to be 5.7 million, with over one million in the greater Port-Au-Prince area. Haiti suffers from a lack of natural resources and a terrain which is 70 percent mountainous. In addition, erosion of the topsoil resulting from destruction of the forest cover on the hillsides and the frequent droughts and floods in various parts of the island have lowered agricultural production and the income of peasant families. Coffee, essential oils from vetiver, and mangoes are the primary agricultural exports. Most farming is done on small plots owned by peasant families and subdivided through inheritance over generations, resulting in inefficient agricultural practices. The Government has endorsed the development of agricultural cooperatives to improve productivity and access to markets for farmers in remote areas. Food imports are necessary, and even with them Haitians receive only 93 percent of their caloric supply requirements. More than 60 percent of children under five suffer from some malnutrition, and nearly 10 percent of these are characterized as seriously malnourished.

The most dynamic sector of the Haitian economy is the assembly industry, which has created over 50,000 jobs in the past ten years. This has been due primarily to favorable Government investment policy, high labor productivity, and a low minimum daily wage (currently $3.00), which have attracted foreign businessmen either for direct investment or for subcontracting of assembly operations. Spurred by a growing U.S. economy, which receives over 90 percent of the total output of the assembly industry, and the benefits of duty-free entry into the United States for many products under the Caribbean Basin Initiative (CBI), the assembly industry is expected to grow rapidly in the future.

HAITI

Haiti has an extremely complex society. Conflicts and suspicions among the various social groups have left little tradition of national service. Mass education, for example, has seldom been encouraged and at times has been actively discouraged. The same has applied to agricultural and infrastructural development, health care, and openness to the world. A consequence of this social disorganization has been lack of respect for political and civil rights by those in positions of authority.

The role of women in Haitian society is limited by the nation's traditionalism. Since 1982 there has been no legal discrimination against women as compared to men. Women enjoy full rights to education and property ownership and such social rights as divorce. Nevertheless, especially among the peasantry, women are limited to traditional domestic occupations. Middle class women quite often work, but generally out of economic necessity. Women comprise a large part of the assembly work force. Secretarial, teaching, and nursing positions are dominated by women. Few women, however, rise to prominent positions in the Haitian business world. As a rule, greater opportunities are available to women in the civilian government bureaucracy. There are two women secretaries of state, and several women of upper- and mid-level managerial rank are in the Government. Women are not permitted in the armed forces, except as nurses.

HONDURAS

Honduras continues to make encouraging progress as a democracy. Governed since 1982 by the civilian administration of President Roberto Suazo Cordova, the country is now preparing for the November, 1985 national elections. The military remains strong and is clearly an important force, but it supports the civilian government. Following the removal from office of the Chief of the Armed Forces and others in March, the new military leaders promptly pledged their support for civilian rule and their commitment to scheduled 1985 elections.

There are four legally registered political parties, each represented in the National Congress. A massive voter registration program is underway in preparation for the elections, which would mark the first democratic succession of governments in recent history. Labor and campesino organizations continue to operate freely and play a major role in national events. Freedom of assembly, of religion, and of the press are fully respected, as is freedom of movement both within Honduras and in and out of the country.

Instability and turmoil in Central America inevitably affect domestic human rights in Honduras. Both the military buildup in Nicaragua and instability in El Salvador add to Honduras' security concerns. In the summer of 1983 and again in 1984 there were incursions into Honduras by members of a Sandinista trained and supplied group. Captured group members included Hondurans who later told of their training in Nicaragua and Cuba for activities designed to destabilize the Honduran Government. Although terrorist acts have declined since 1982, the threat continues. In March bombs were placed targeting the Supreme Court, the officer training school in Tegucigalpa, and the local police station and the Salvadoran consulate in San Pedro Sula. In April the Embassy of El Salvador in Tegucigalpa was dynamited. There were discoveries of weapons caches and terrorist safehouses throughout the country, although fewer than in previous years. In reaction to the continuing treat, the Government maintains security measures that include vehicle searches and documentation checks. Considerable effort is also directed towards reducing the infiltration of arms through Honduras to El Salvador.

Honduras now hosts about 36,000 U.N.-sponsored refugees from El Salvador, Nicaragua and Guatemala and about 35,000 non-sponsored refugees, the latter mostly Nicaraguan. As there is considerable evidence that Salvadoran guerrillas use the camps near the border as sanctuaries, these refugees are largely restricted to camps. Reception, care and protection of refugees by the Honduran Government, however, is excellent.

Honduras is plagued by economic and social problems to which the Government is giving increased attention, especially in the areas of education, public health, and land reform. Women are not subject to legal discrimination. Social and economic conditions, however, often deny them true equality.

Local human rights leaders have confirmed that improvement has been made in human rights, while continuing to pressure the Government for further improvement and accountability. Allegations of human rights-related abuses are fewer than in previous years and the Honduran Government shows enhanced sensitivity to these complaints. On September 25, President Suazo Cordova sent a letter to the Chief of the Armed Forces in which he sought to underscore a national policy with respect to the observance of human rights.

Unresolved disappearances remain the major concern of local human rights groups. Significantly, however, there were only five new reported disappearance cases in 1984, all early in the year. A government investigation of disappearances has been underway since June 1984. An interim report was released on December 31, and at the same time the investigating commission was extended for ninety days. It is not yet clear when and how the final results will be published.

Cases of mistreatment of prisoners are alleged, including torture, although the number of allegations has decreased since last year. Prisons are overcrowded and conditions poor. Due process is constitutionally guaranteed, and progress in judicial reform is being made.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

The head of the private Committee for the Defense of Human Rights in Honduras has accused the Government of involvement in deaths that were allegedly politically motivated. No more than five cases were alleged by various interested parties during 1984. The Government has responded that either these cases occured during active pursuit of guerrillas and subversives or that private conflicts resulted in some of the deaths.

b. Disappearance

According to the Committee for the Defense of Human Rights, a total of 112 unexplained disappearances have occurred in Honduras during 1981-1984. Five new cases were claimed in 1984, compared to ten cases in 1983. These five cases date to the period January-March 1984, and there have been no substantiated incidents since then. The most dramatic of the disappearances were those in March of Rolando Vindel, Secretary General of the Electrical Workers Union, and Gustavo Morales, Sub-Director of the National Lottery. Both were seized publicly by armed men and have not been heard of since. The Government denies knowledge of their whereabouts or of events leading to their disappearances. It denies as well that they are being held by security forces. Government officials continue to claim that many of those who "disappeared" are in fact exiles who left Honduras to receive guerrilla training in Nicaragua or Cuba. Several others, although their names appear on the "disappeared" list, have been found living normal lives.

In some instances during the year, in cases that involved alleged subversion or terrorism, the Government security forces denied knowledge of the whereabouts of disappeared persons but later arraigned those same individuals or released them after questioning. One such case involved the detention in March, 1983 and release in July, 1984 of accused subversive Ines Murillo.

Human rights groups met in 1984 with high government officials, including Foreign Minister Paz Barnica, Armed Forces Chief General Walter Lopez and Armed Forces Auditor General Suarez Benavides, to discuss disappearances. The meetings were hailed as successful and encouraging by local human rights leaders. In October, the Chairman of the Congressional Commission on Constitutional Guarantees publicly expressed interest in the problem and spoke of serious obstacles in the way of establishing the fate of those claimed as disappeared. A military commission, appointed by the Chief of the Armed Forces on June 14, 1984, to investigate the problem of disappearances, submitted an interim report to President Suazo Cordova on December 29 and publicly released it two days later. This report, short on specific information, was sharply criticized by a number of Honduran groups concerned with human rights issues as being vague, inconsistent and contradictory. It is not clear whether a final, more complete account of the commission's findings will be published.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Torture is prohibited under the law, and its practice is officially denied. Nevertheless, there were cases in 1984 that involved credible physical evidence that torture does at times occur. Amnesty International's 1983 report mentions documented cases of use of the capucha, or hood, and released detainees sometimes tell of beatings. However, in certain cases which are clearly documented, disciplinary action has been taken against the responsible officials. In January, the head of the National Department of Investigation was removed and two policemen sentenced to prison following the beating and death of a detained student. In August, the local press reported an allegation by an accused member of the "Cinchoneros," the group which claimed responsiblity for several bombings, that he had been denied medical attention for knee injuries suffered while in detention. He has since received the needed surgery. When torture is substantiated, the courts have found evidence so obtained as inadmissible. In fact, to be admissible as evidence, confessions obtained by police have to be repeated to an officer of the court.

Other forms of mistreatment, such as denial of food and rest are fairly common. There is no capital punishment in Honduras.

Prison conditions are poor. Prisons are overcrowded and dirty, and prisoners or their relatives must provide some, if not all, of their own food. Visits are liberally allowed, however, and at times prisoners are permitted to leave to attend to urgent family problems. Better conditions may be obtained by those able to pay for them.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Although there has been a reduction in the amount of detention time before a hearing, extended pre-arraignment detention is fairly common. Under Honduran law, a person must be presented before a judge within 24 hours of arrest and the judge must decide within six days whether there is sufficient evidence to hold the accused for trial. In practice this is not always followed, often due to administrative problems. Cases of persons accused of subversion or terrorism are likely to be delayed several days or even weeks. Security forces complain that the rules of evidence under the 1906 penal procedure code do not allow sufficient time for leads in security cases to be explored, resulting at times in delays in presenting a detainee to the court owing to the security forces' wish to complete investigations after detaining the suspect. The present penal code, including the procedural code, has now been revised and the new code will be implemented in March, 1985. Although most arrests are made openly, in some cases, most often those involving alleged terrorist or subversive activity, arrests are made secretly and the accused held for several days without authorities acknowledging the detention.

An "appeal for personal exhibition" can be filed with the Supreme Court to locate an individual, but the success of this motion depends entirely on the cooperation of security forces. Recently, in a promising development, a judge requested and received permission to search a local military prison for missing individuals. Release on bail is common, and accused persons are free to select their own lawyers. In theory, public defenders are available, but in practice this is often not the case, due to budgetary constraints.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Although slow and at times cumbersome, the judicial system does allow for fair trial. There are no secret tribunals. Delays almost always result from administrative inadequacy and not from deliberate action. Persons are tried for criminal acts and not for political beliefs, although social and economic status are factors in obtaining adequate access to legal process. There have been cases where it appears persons may have been arrested and held for a limited time because of political beliefs. They are invariably released if they have committed no crime. There are no political prisoners.

The Constitution provides for judicial independence. Supreme Court justices are appointed for four-year terms by the National Congress and lower court judges by the Supreme Court. Since Congress is controlled by the Liberal Party of President Suazo, the executive office also exercises considerable control over the judiciary.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Although there have been scattered reports in rural areas of security forces entering homes without authorization to search for terrorists, these incidents are the result of abuse of authority rather than official policy. The Government does not interfere with its citizens' personal or family lives.

Section 2 Respect of Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of expression is guaranteed by the Constitution, and both freedom of speech and press are respected. Honduras has four daily newspapers, over 100 radio stations, and a two-station national television network, all privately owned. The press openly criticizes the Government, military, and private sector, often harshly. It does so without fear of government reprisal. Academic freedom is respected and student groups represent a wide spectrum of political beliefs.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The freedom to organize and demonstrate publicly is enjoyed by political parties, student organizations, campesino groups, labor unions, and other private organizations, including human rights groups. Many have held peaceful public demonstrations in the past year. The Government does not generally interfere, although police are present to maintain order. The Government does not hesitate to act, however, in cases of illegal strikes, as in the September, 1984 strike by the electrical workers' union.

In August, six labor activists, all U.S. citizens and self-proclaimed representatives of AFL-CIO affiliated unions, were deported when they participated in a public rally denouncing the Honduran Government and military. The Government considered this action a violation of Honduran law prohibiting foreigners from political activity while in Honduras.

Trade unions in Honduras are independent, strong, and varied in political orientation. Labor legislation is weighted in favor of workers and most industries are unionized. Although not directly involved in party politics, the unions are influential and their positions are given attention by the political parties. Antonio Julin Mendez, recently reelected president of the largest of the campesino unions is also one of the three elected representatives of the Innovation and Unity Party in the National Congress. Both professional associations and private organizations exist.

c. Freedom of Religion

Honduras has no state religion. Although the country is predominantly Roman Catholic, members of other denominations and religions are represented, and their members are free to practice religion and engage in all areas of social and political activity. Missionaries operate in many areas of the country.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Hondurans and most foreign nationals are free to travel within or outside of Honduras. Security concerns have periodically resulted in vehicle and document checks, but there are no permanent travel restrictions within the country.

The number of refugees in Honduras, both outside and under U.N. sponsorship, has swelled to almost 70,000. Some refugees, notably those in camps near the Salvadoran border, are not allowed to leave the camps, although these controls are not effectively enforced. Restrictions are defended as necessaery due to the proximity of camps to the Salvadoran border and their use by guerrillas. Honduras and El Salvador are currently discussing the voluntary repatriation of those Salvadoran refugees who wish to return to their country. Several Salvadorans were forcefully repatriated, but they had violated their refugee status by engaging in violent acts against the Government of Honduras. There was also an unexplained deportation of several Nicaraguans, who had requested refugee status, by Honduran immigration authorities. In general, however, the record of the Honduran government in its reception and treatment of refugees is excellent.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change their Government

With the civilian administration of President Roberto Suazo Cordova in its final year, vigorous political activity is underway in preparation for the November, 1985 elections. The National Registry of Persons seeks to place all Honduran citizens 18 years old and over on the electoral rolls. Voting is mandatory under Honduran law. All legally registered parties -- there are currently four -- freely choose their candidates, and voters freely select their choices through secret ballot. The National Congress has delegates from all four parties but is currently controlled by the Liberal Party, which has an absolute majority of the members.

In March, following the removal of Chief of the Armed Forces General Gustavo Alvarez and other top military leaders, the new military leaders promptly declared the continuing loyalty of the armed forces to the civilian government and their commitment to democracy and to the 1985 elections. The armed forces retain a strong political influence but defer publicly and privately to the democratically-elected civilian leadership.

Section 4 Government Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Honduran Government has shown increased interest in cooperating with both local and international human rights organizations. Government officials, civilian and military, have met with representatives of such organizations on a number of occasions. The two private human rights groups organized in Honduras are the Committee for the Defense of Human Rights in Honduras and the Committee of Families of Disappeared Persons. Leaders and members of both speak openly and are widely reported in the Honduran press. The Committee of Families of Disappeared Persons schedules a monthly march or vigil in the capital. Human Rights Committee chairman Ramon Custodio in October described the current timeframe as a "period of tranquility" in human rights in Honduras.

In Amnesty International Report 1984, concern was expressed over reports of arbitrary arrest, detention, torture, disappearances, and extrajudicial executions. The Honduran government was also criticized for its denial of any knowledge of the circumstances in many of these cases. In fact, Government and military leaders have shown sensitivity to such reports. The Congressional Committee on Constitutional Guarantees has exhibited new interest in disappearances and extrajudicial procedures. The Honduran Bar Association has a committee on human rights, and its chairman frequently contributes articles to local newspapers. Groups of interested persons from the United States and Europe have shown interest in human rights problems in Honduras. A delegation from the West German parliament was successful in securing the release from prison of Ines Murillo, a dual West German-Honduran citizen who was implicated in a political kidnapping. The armed forces have responded to questions concerning their role in disappearances with an investigation, not yet completed. In 1984 the number of complaints about such practices has declined. Freedom House rates Honduras "Free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Honduras continues to be plagued by economic problems. The estimated per capita GNP, accurding to 1982 World Bank statistics, is $600 and the GDP in constant 1966 terms only slightly more than one billion dollars. In mid-1983 the population of 4,249,000 was growing at a rate of 3.4 percent. Infant mortality, according to the Honduran Medical Association, is 90 per 1,000 live births; the 1984 World Bank figure is 75.5. Life expectancy is 60.36 years. Caloric consumption relative to nutritional requirements is 93 percent; as of 1976, approximately 46 percent of the population had access to safe water and 27 percent to electricity. An estimated 55 percent of the Honduran population has access to some form of health care and 45 percent to indoor plumbing. About 14 percent of the urban and 54.9 percent of the rural population are below the absolute poverty level.

Attempts are being made to improve the educational level and literacy rate of both children and adults. Primary school enrollment (as a percentage of primary school age children) shows little difference between males (91 percent) and females (90 percent). The total enrollment for secondary school (as a percentage of the secondary school age group), however, is only 30 percent. The literacy rate, given at 43.1 percent by the World Bank in 1974, has risen to about 60 percent. There is little difference in the figures for literacy between males and females, and a national literacy campaign is underway.

The Government continues to show interest in land reform; a land titling program sponsored by AID is now providing 1,000 titles per month. Although the process has at times been slow, Honduras has a 25-year history of land reform, accepted for the most part by larger landowners. Much of the agricultural outputs is from small farmers. There are, for example, 45,000 independent coffee growers. Population growth, in the past few years, has increased pressure by campesinos to occupy unused land, at times resulting in violence. Through the National Agraian Institute, the Government has a program to grant legal title to such land to peasants.

Women are formally protected from discrimination under Honduran law. In practice, however, much depends on economic and social position. Education is equally available to men and women and statistics reveal almost equal school attendance by males and females at all levels. Although women occupy judgeships and there are several respected women doctors, lawyers, and other professionals, there are relatively few women in high government positions and fewer still in responsible positions in the private sector. A woman serves as Attorney General in the Government and Justice Ministry, in October 1984 Congresswoman Dilma Quezada was named as one of six members on the Board of Directors for the Inter-American Committee on Women, and women occupy positions of influence in all four political parties. The national police has a women's branch, although use of women officers is limited to certain services. In practice there remains some discrimination against women, especially in domestic cases. Ethnic minorities, concentrated on the north coast, enjoy social and legal equalty.

JAMAICA

Jamaica is a constitutional parliamentary democracy with a mixed economy emphasizing the private sector. It is a member of the British Commonwealth. A governor general, appointed by the Crown on the advice of the Prime Minister, represents the Queen, while the elected Prime Minister, the leader of the majority party in Parliament, is the country's chief executive. The Parliament is comprised of the elected House of Representatives (currently 60 members) and the appointed Senate of 21. The powers and procedures of Parliament correspond to those of the Westminister model.

Two major political parties, the Jamaica Labour Party and the People's National Party, have alternated in power since the first elections were held under universal adult suffrage in 1944. The Jamaica Labour Party's leader, Edward Seaga, has been Prime Minister since November 1980. The Constitution requires that general elections be held at least once every five years; the last general election was held on December 15, 1983. However, because an outdated voters' list was being used, the People's National Party boycotted the election and the Jamaica Labour Party gained all sixty seats in the House of Representatives. The next parliamentary elections must be held before January 10, 1989.

The opposition's boycott created an anomalous and unprecedented situation for democratic Jamaica. The Jamaica Labour Party has attempted to compensate for the absence of an elected parliamentary opposition by appointment of independent senators to the upper chamber and enhancing opportunities for citizens to appear and address the House.

The Government continues to respect civil rights, including freedom of religion, speech, press and association. It also respects the right of citizens to change their government through free elections.

The relatively small, apolitical security apparatus comes under the Ministry of National Security and consists of the Jamaica Constabulary Force, the Jamaica Special Constabulary Force, and the Jamaica Defense Force. The latter consists of a regular and a reserve force and includes an air wing and a coast guard. Since 1974, the Jamaica Defense Force has been authorized to conduct joint operations with the police in order to maintain the peace, under the Suppression of Crime Act.

The British system of justice operates in Jamaica. The law comprises English common law and statutory law enacted both before and since independence. Jamaican statutes are usually patterned after English law, as modified to fit local conditions.

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

Officially sanctioned murder of political opponents does not occur in Jamaica. However, Jamaica suffers from a high level of violent crime, some of which is politically motivated. Much of this violence was associated with election campaigns. The December 1983 election, however, was quiet, with minimal violence and no deaths.

JAMAICA

Both major parties, as well as the Communist Workers Party of Jamaica, have supporters who occasionally employ violence for political purposes. On the whole, the legal system has been unable to bring the guilty parties to justice because of a pervasive code of silence enforced at the local level.

During 1984, there were several killings rumored to have been politically motivated. The police have made several arrests and cases are awaiting trial. In all cases, the Government and opposition have condemned the incidents. The Government has, in most cases, moved expeditiously to arrest the perpetrators.

b. Disappearance

There is no evidence of abduction, hostage-taking, or disappearances occasioned by official forces. In most incidents where people disappear and are later discovered dead, the victims are linked with criminal cases or have been accused of being police "informers."

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Generally, legal prohibitions against torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment are respected. Access to detainees by relatives, attorneys, physicians, and friends is routine. There have been occasional claims in the press of unjustified killings, beatings, and other abuses by police, and the Communist Workers Party of Jamaica has periodically charged the police force with politically motivated harassment. Many observers believe a small minority of individuals within the police force abuse their authority, especially during operations against criminal gunmen. Officials involved in the abuse of prisoners are liable to punishment, and citizens bringing such charges through the Government or through the courts have won compensatory damages.

In 1984, the parliamentary ombudsman issued a report on the deplorable prison conditions in Jamaica. The country's jails are described as unsanitary and extremely overcrowded. The report has been taken up by Parliament and given prominence in the press. Both the public and the Government agree on the need to improve prison conditions, but the latter is hampered by severe resource constraints. A corrections bill, incorporating various elements of penal reform, is presently before the Parliament.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

There are no political prisoners in Jamaica. The security forces do not need a warrant in order to detain persons "reasonably" suspected of having committed a crime. However, the Suppression of Crime Act, which has been extended since 1974, limits the period of detention before being charged to a "reasonable time." The detainee must be brought before a court "without delay." Practice is for appearance before a magistrate or a court on the next court day, usually within a few days of arrest. In the event of a further delay, authorities must indicate why the person is being held longer.

Arbitrary detention without trial has not been reported, although the opposition has periodically complained of irregularities in preventive detention practices by the police.

Habeas corpus is implicit in the Constitution, rooted in common law, and respected by the courts and the police. The Constitution guarantees that a detained person must be informed of charges "within a reasonable amount of time." There is a functioning system of bail, granted on a discretionary basis.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Jamaica has an independent judiciary. Persons who have been charged with a criminal offense have access to legal representation, and legal counsel is provided to indigents in criminal cases. The Court of Appeal and the Parliament may refer cases to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the United Kingdom. The legal system is overburdened, and many cases take years to come to trial.

In addition to the regular courts, there is also the Gun Court, which was established in 1974 as an extraordinary means of dealing with the serious problem of violent crime. It considers cases involving the illegal use or the possession of firearms or ammunition. There are restrictions on public attendance and less stringent rules of evidence in the Gun Court. Hearings are conducted before a judge, except in murder cases, which require a jury. The Gun Court has become increasingly controversial. The 1983 Gun Court Amendment Act made sentencing discretionary by eliminating the previously mandatory sentence of life imprisonment, gave all resident magistrates more leeway to grant bail, allowed magistrates outside of the Kingston area discretion in referring non-capital offense cases to the Gun Court, and removed to juvenile courts cases involving children under the age of 14. A continuing review of the cases of persons given life sentences prior to the adoption of the Gun Court Amendment Act has resulted in some 100 persons receiving parole this year.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitution prohibits arbitrary intrusion of the state into the private life of the individual. Individual rights are protected, and there is no arbitrary monitoring of correspondence or telephones, nor restrictions on receipt of foreign publications. Search warrants are not required to enter homes or businesses when crime is "reasonably" suspected. However, regulations approved by Parliament in 1980 require that every effort be made by the security forces to have the owner or occupant of the premises present during the search.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedom of speech and press are guaranteed in the Constitution and are observed in practice within the broad limits of libel laws and the State Secrets Act. There is no censorship nor is there interference in academic studies. Jamaica's principal, privately owned daily newspaper, The Daily Gleaner, has been critical of Jamaican governments through the years. Several small newspapers and magazines are also published, including two by the opposition parties, both of which are highly critical of government policies. Foreign publications are generally available.

In June 1984, there was a widely publicized incident involving a police shooting in which the police interfered with and manhandled The Daily Gleaner photographer at the scene who was trying to take pictures. The Police Commissioner promptly apologized and a subsequent editorial in the newspaper expressed satisfaction at the measures taken and reassurances given by the police that it would not tolerate any fettering of the press. Jamaica's one television station is government owned, although there are plans to establish a second channel with private participation. The government-owned television and radio network has historically been accused of bias in favor of the Government by whichever party is in opposition. A second radio station, while partially government owned, is politically independent.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Freedom of assembly and association are guaranteed in the Constitution. A large variety of professional groups and private associations function freely. Public demonstrations and rallies are staged by all political parties without government interference. Public demonstrations require police permits which are normally granted. In 1984 the opposition demonstrated at the formal opening of Parliament and has since held demonstrations on several other occasions. Three nonviolent demonstrations took place in April, even though police permits were refused because the mandatory notice was not given.

Approximately 25 percent of the Jamaican work force is organized into strong, independent trade unions. The right to form and belong to trade unions is constitutionally guaranteed, and unions are among the most active organizations in the country. The two major unions are each associated with one of the two major political parties. They operate as independent organizations, however, and differ at times with their parties. They have contributed many leaders to the national political process, among whom are the current Deputy Prime Minister/Minister of Foreign Affairs and two former Prime Ministers. In May 1984 the 21st Biennial Congress of the National Workers Union unanimously elected former Prime Minister Michael Manley, leader of the People's National Party, as the union's new president. Unions make active use of the bargaining rights guaranteed in the Labor Relations and Industrial Disputes Act of 1975. Jamaican workers, including government employees, frequently exercise their right to strike.

Jamaican unions are affiliated with regional and international labor bodies.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is guaranteed in the Constitution and is well established in Jamaica. A great variety of religious groups, including several African and animistic religions and cults, operate freely. More than 80 percent of the population professes one Christian denomination or another. In September 1984, Prime Minister Seaga was the only head of government invited as guest speaker at the Second World Congress on Religious Liberty in Rome. His leadership of Jamaica and support of basic human rights were cited as the reasons for the invitation.

d. Freedom of Movement within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Constitution guarantees Jamaican citizens freedom of movement throughout the country, the right to reside in any part of it, the right to enter, and immunity from expulsion. There are no national restrictions on foreign travel or emigration. Citizenship is not revoked for political reasons.

Jamaica's central location in the Caribbean makes it a potential hub for illegal migrants and would-be refugees or asylum seekers. Consequently, Jamaica has avoided any declarative policy on refugees. As a party to the 1951 UN Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees, it honors its treaty obligations, dealing with refugees on a "case by case" basis. Jamaica's reasons for not accepting migrants are largely economic ones, and include high domestic unemployment. In recent years individuals from Cuba, Haiti, and Nicaragua have sought to settle and work in Jamaica, claiming to be "refugees." Haitians are considered economic migrants, and most are returned to Haiti. In two recent cases, seven of the 30 Cuban migrants who were granted de facto temporary status in 1982 were permanently resettled in Canada. Of 17 Nicaraguan "boat people" who arrived in May 1983, only five now remain in temporary status in Jamaica.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

In Jamaica, the Prime Minister, who is the leader of the majority party, and a cabinet made up of ministers appointed by him, constitute the executive power. The executive usually takes the initiative in legislative matters and is responsible to the House of Represenatives. The position of the Leader of the Opposition is provided for under the Constitution.

The Jamaican Constitution, in common with those of many Commonwealth countries, requires that elections be held not later than five years from the first sitting of parliament. However, it also gives the Prime Minister with the right, within that period, to call an election whenever he sees fit.

Within the multiparty political system, two main parties (The Jamaica Labour Party and People's National Party) have regularly alternated in power since the first elections under universal adult suffrage were held in 1944. The Jamaica Labor party came to power in November 1980 when it won a majority of seats in the House of Representatives. Other opposition groups, including the communists, operate freely, and no group is denied participation in the political process. The political system does not exclude ethnic groups or women. There are no restrictions on nationality or citizenship status which limit participation in political life, and all citizens 18 years of age and over are eligible to vote.

In August 1983, a process of voter registration with photographs was begun throughout the island, in order to bring voting lists up to date and help protect the electoral process from fraud. However, the process was not complete when elections were called in December 1983. This was cited by the People's National party in explaining its decision to boycott the election.

JAMAICA

As a result of the boycott and the failure of any of the seven third-party candidates to be elected to the House, there is currently no official Leader of the Opposition. As the elected House, composed of 60 seats, is now under exclusive control of the members of the Jamaica Labour Party, Jamaica has a "one-party house" but is not a "one-party state." Mr. Michael Manley, leader of the People's National Party, has repeatedly claimed that the present Government is "bogus" and has no mandate to govern; he calls for new elections once voter registration is complete. However, the Government correctly points out that the 1983 election was held in strict conformity with the election law. Local elections, which were to have been held not later than June 1984, have been postponed. The Government claimed that revisions of the voters' list and other acts which were necessary for holding them would not be ready in time. Legislation was passed which would permit the Government to delay local elections up through June 1985.

The present Government has taken steps to maintain a democratic complexion in the legislature. Procedures have been amended to enable any citizen having an interest in a matter under debate to make a presentation by appearing at the bar of the House. In the absence of a formal Leader of the Opposition in Parliament to nominate eight candidates as opposition senators, the Prime Minister has appointed eight independent senators who are fulfilling their roles as active monitors and critics of government policy.

Both major parties are committed to keeping parliamentary democracy alive under the unprecedented circumstance of a one-party makeup in the House.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

There has been little interest among international or non-governmental groups in investigating human rights in Jamaica. Freedom House in 1983 rated Jamaica as "free." Amnesty International expressed concern in its 1984 report over the continued use of the death penalty.

Legislation on penal reform, comprising a corrections bill for prison reform and a criminal records bill, was tabled before Parliament in 1984.

There are no restrictions on human rights organizations, several of which exist within the country. The Jamaica Council for Human Rights is the most active domestic human rights organization. The Council has continued to speak out about the large number of killings by the police, and demanded a public inquiry into such deaths.

Jamaica is a member of several international bodies which protect human rights. The country is also a strong advocate of human rights in international forums, such as Caricom and the U.N. Jamaican leaders, including the present Prime Minister, have spoken before regional and other international bodies on behalf of human rights. A Jamaican is a judge on the Inter-American Court of Human Rights.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Production of bauxite/alumina, Jamaica's principal export earner, remained depressed in 1983, but receipts from tourism increased as the number of visitors grew by 16.9 percent compared to 1982. Gross national product grew by 1.8 percent in 1983. Inflation rose by 16.7 percent, a significant increase after single digit rises in the two previous years. The employment rate fell only marginally in 1983 from 27.9 percent in 1982 to 26.9 percent. Shortage of foreign exchange and budget cuts have left the Government with fewer resources to deal with pressing economic and social problems. The Government has given priority to maintaining the inflows of raw materials and capital goods needed to support Jamaica's private sector-oriented recovery program. While consumer imports have been cut and the currency devalued sharply, the Government is trying to limit the impact of these measures on the consumption of basic commodities by the poor, establishing the Food Security Plan, including a food stamp program, aimed at protecting the basic nutrition of the poor.

Jamaica has a per capita gross national product of $1333 (1982). There are, however, wide disparities in income levels. In October 1983, the unemployment rate for men over 24 years of age was lower than 15 percent, while that for women over 24 was more than 30 percent. The rate for all workers over 24 years was slightly more than 15 percent whereas that for workers under 24 years was almost 50 percent. The Government is seeking to reduce some of these disparities through a major agriculture program designed to increase production and employment in rural areas, job training programs for youth, and programs to assist individuals in starting their own business.

The adult literacy rate in Jamaica is 97 percent, and there is nearly universal primary school enrollment. Jamaica's educational system is free but the rising cost of living has placed a financial strain on families, who must provide school books and uniforms.

Jamaican women are accorded full equality under the Constitution, and the 1975 Employment Act guarantees equal pay for equal work. The legal status of women is reflected in the number of influential positions they hold in the civil service and the Government, including Minister of Education, Director of the Jamaica Information Service, and President of the Senate.

Nevertheless, because of cultural and social values, women often suffer economic discrimination. This discrimination frequently occurs in hiring practices. Access to higher paying jobs and jobs outside traditional "female" areas is limited. Reportedly, women have no choice but to settle for accepted "woman's work" in service fields such as teachers, health care workers, and commercial workers (produce vendors, sales clerks, secretaries, and office clerks). The higher paying senior level positions in commercial areas are still predominantly held by men. The 1975 Act has helped to narrow the gap between men's and women's salaries, although disparities remain.

The country's economic problems tend to affect women first because they generally work in the service sector, frequently do not have sufficient seniority to avoid layoffs, and service jobs, especially in the public sector, are the first to be cut.

Employment figures for October 1983 showed that women constituted 37.7 percent of the labor force as a whole, but they comprised 66.14 precent of the unemployed labor force.

The Government has a number of programs to help women with the problems they face. Primary health care clinics provide pre-natal and post-natal care for mothers and their children. The National Family Planning Board organizes education programs in family planning, population, and family life. A new food stamp program includes special provisions for pregnant and lactating women and women whose income is below $50 a month. The Women's Bureau in the Ministry of Youth and Community Development, established in 1974, sponsors agricultural and technical training projects and centers to provide continuing education for pregnant women. The Government has announced plans to establish a national advisory committee for women's affairs. Meanwhile, family law reforms based on the Report of the Family Law Committee set up in 1975 have finally come before the House this year. These include inheritance provisions for the family and a dependent's bill. Jamaica is a multiracial society. No ethnic group has been subjected to systematic discrimination.

Increasing crime and violence have been major social problems in Jamaica in recent years. Rising unemployment, urbanization, lessened respect for authority and the police force, overworked courts, and pressures on the security forces have contributed to the growing crime rate, despite the measures taken by successive Jamaican Governments to deal with the problem.

MEXICO

Mexico is a Federal Republic which has been governed by the Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI) since 1929. The Constitution of 1917 provides for the separation of powers among a bicameral legislature, a judiciary, and an executive, but the powers of the presidency far outweigh those of the other branches in Mexico's highly centralized system. Mexico has a sizable industrial sector. There are also large peasant and indigenous populations in the rural sector, which continue greatly to rely on manual labor.

The PRI dominates politics at the federal and state levels. Opposition parties, viewed by the Government as outlets for criticism and dissatisfaction, have been able to make some inroads on the municipal level. Opposition strength, especially that of the conservative National Action Party (PAN), is growing, though some observers characterize this increase as a protest vote against the PRI. The opposition has yet to challenge the PRI successfully on the state level, let alone for the presidency. Most opposition party opportunities have been thwarted by nationwide PRI voting strength and organizational power, by maneuvers to divide the opposition and, the opposition claims, by continuing electoral fraud. In elections held in 1983 and 1984, protests about electoral fraud were especially strong in the states of Sinaloa, San Luis Potosi and Coahuila. For its part, the Government continues to emphasize its commitment to the principle of political pluralism.

Both Amnesty International and the National Committee in Defense of Prisoners, Persecuted, Disappeared, and Political Exiles in Mexico, continue to express their concern over the fate of Mexico's "disappeared". In June, the Committee presented a list of persons who had disappeared since 1969. While admitting that many of these persons had reappeared, the Committee charged that all those unaccounted for are being held clandestinely in government prisons. The Government has denied these charges and has stated that disappearances will not be tolerated. The Committee also alleges the existence of 315 persons it terms "political prisoners", 285 of whom were jailed during the current Administration; the great majority of these are peasants involved in land disputes. In response to the Committee's presentation of 38 of the most noteworthy cases, the Government said that some are in the process of investigation, while others have resulted in sentences for criminal acts.

Human rights organizations have continued to make allegations concerning arbitrary arrests, especially of members of opposition parties, unions independent of the PRI, and peasant organizations. A number of deaths have also taken place, especially in the rural sector in disputes over land.

The Federal Government during 1984 implemented efforts to curb misuse of police authority; local leaders on the municipal level, especially those involved with influential private landowners, are not as rigorous in protecting human rights, and abuses appear to stem largely from that sector.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

The current Administration reopened an investigation into the January 1982 discovery of 14 bodies found in the Tula River. Investigation at the time had proven fruitless. Warrants have now been issued against 24 members of the former Division of Investigation for the Prevention of Delinquency (DIPD), an arm of the Federal District's police force which was disbanded as one of the first acts of the new Administration. A number of arrests have already been made. It is alleged that the former DIPD members abducted, tortured and killed the 14 victims, 13 Colombians and 1 Mexican, who themselves were reportedly involved, along with elements of the DIPD, in the drug trade and a series of bank robberies. Testimony has been given that the acts of the DIPD were carried out on the instructions of a former director of the Federal and Transit Police and a former director of the DIPD for the purpose of extorting money from the victims. An arrest order has been issued against the latter; the former is currently awaiting extradition from the United States.

Peasant organizations charged that during 1984 at least 69 peasants were killed in confrontations in the states of Chiapas, Veracruz, Puebla, Hidalgo, Sonora, Oaxaca and Guanajuato. Such charges have come not only from independent peasant organizations such as the Marxist-led and -oriented Independent Center of Agricultural Workers and Peasants (CIOAC) and the National Coordinator for the Plan of Ayala (CNPA), but also from the PRI-affiliated National Confederation of Peasants (CNC). The former attribute the killings of peasants affiliated with independent groups to paramilitary bands, supported by corrupt local landowners (caciques) as well as to members of the CNC, and to local police. For its part the CNC attributes fatalities in its ranks to members of the independent unions, encouraged, they say, by leftist political activists. Others, however, suggest that for the most part CNC members who have been killed were victims of internal CNC struggles.

A major incident in 1984 involved the killing of nine members of a leftist independent peasant group in the town of Venustiano Carranza, Chiapas, on October 6. Following up on leads that the perpetrators were members of the CNC, backed up by agents of public security, the Attorney General for the State of Chiapas on October 10 announced the arrest of 18 members of the CNC. On October 19, a violent confrontation between members of the CNC and CIOAC left three dead, two members of CIOAC and one CNC member.

On September 26, four members of the leftist Unified Socialist Party of Mexico (PSUM) were killed near the village of San Jose Miahuatlan, Puebla, a municipality governed by the PSUM. Three of the victims were peasants; one, Felipe Fernandez Valiente, was a member of the State Committee of the PSUM. The four were killed in an armed ambush. Authorities have suggested that the attack was a politically-motivated assassination--more specifically, that the perpetrators were acting on behalf of local caciques, concerned that the PSUM had been active in organizing peasants in the area against their interests.

MEXICO

Within Mexico there are about 47,000 registered Guatemalan refugees, the majority of whom live along its southern border. On April 20, 1984, 6 refugees were killed and 6 wounded in the El Chupadero Camp (Chiapas) during an armed incursion into Mexico from Guatemala. Eyewitnesses stated that the perpetrators were members of the Guatemalan Army; the Government of Guatemala said that they were guerrillas, dressed in army uniforms. The Mexican Government protested the incident to Guatemala, though it did not identify the perpetrators.

There have been rumors of maltreatment of the Guatemalan refugees by the Mexican security forces, especially during the relocation of the camps from Chiapas to Campeche, following the El Chupadero incident. The Catholic Bishop of San Cristobal de las Casas published an open letter in the Mexican press shortly after July 5, when, he said, three Guatemalan refugees were killed by Mexican security forces during the relocation of the Ixcan Camp. His protest was first aired by the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC) before being published in Mexico. Those killings have not been independently verified, and the Government has yet to comment officially.

Amnesty International's 1984 Report (covering the period January-December 1983) expresses that organization's concern over killings, specifically in the rural area. It highlights that such killings, carried out by local security forces and armed civilians acting with them, have been directed towards peasants involved in land disputes, members of peasant organizations and rural trade unions created outside the official party, the PRI.

b. Disappearance

The Committee in Defense of Prisoners, Persecuted, Disappeared and Political Exiles of Mexico, led by Mrs. Rosario Ibarra de Piedra, Mexico's most prominent human rights advocate and the 1982 presidential candidate for the left-wing Revolutionary Workers Party (PRT), continued to press the Government for information on the fate of Mexico's disappeared. On June 5, 1984, the Committee presented two lists to the Interior Secretariat (Gobernacion). The first identified 455 persons whom the Committee states have disappeared between 1969 and December 1982. The second listed 40 persons either detained or disappeared during the current Administration. The Committee itself notes that, of those listed as having disappeared between 1969 and December 1982, three have reappeared. As to the group of 40, all but five have either been freed or otherwise accounted for. The Committee has continued to charge that the disappeared are being held in a chain of clandestine government-controlled prisons. It supports these claims with reports by other human rights groups, news reports, and letters smuggled out of prison. Interviews with disappeared who have reappeared, both on the radio program, "Opinion Publica", and in letters-to-the-editor, also speak of such clandestine prisons. The Government continues to deny strongly the existence of any clandestine prisons, as well as involvement in the disappearance of individuals, and states that those unaccounted for were killed in encounters with security forces, or changed their names, went underground, or voluntarily went into exile. Human rights activists report that the Government has been rigorous in its attempts to determine the whereabouts of those five persons claimed by the Committee to have disappeared and still missing during the period since December 1982.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Although torture is prohibited by the Constitution, human rights organizations have charged that the police have tortured both political prisoners and those arrested for common crimes with electric shocks, beatings, submersion in water, deprivation of light and food, and the forcing of chili-laden mineral water up the nostrils. There are periodic reports in the Mexican press of confessions obtained through coercion. A U.S. journalist reports that he was tortured by means of electric shocks in April 1984, following his detention while covering a local strike in Reynosa. Local authorities have denied the allegations and the Government has begun investigations into the incident and the identity of those responsible. Other American citizens, arrested mainly on drug trafficking charges, complained of torture and inhuman and degrading treatment at the hands of the police in several cases in 1984. One such American claimed to have been interrogated in Oaxaca while blindfolded, naked, with his hands tied behind his back and in a squatting position.

The Government officially denies that torture takes place or is in any way officially sanctioned. However, the current Administration, apparently reacting indirectly to these various charges, is conducting new recruitment, education and training of local and national police forces. Such measures are being implemented especially in the Federal District, where about one quarter of Mexico's population resides.

Prisons are overcrowded, and there are public complaints about lack of trained personnel, a high turnover both in staff and Administration, corruption among prison staff members, and mistreatment of prisoners related to such corruption. Since the current administration took office, reforms have been carried out in the prisons of the Federal District, including doubling the daily budget for food per prisoner, developing prison industries to sell products on the open market, and training prisoners in a marketable skill. In addition, two new prisons are under construction in the Federal District. In some other parts of Mexico as well, overcrowding has been alleviated by new prison construction. In 1983, a new prison was opened in Acapulco, and one is under construction in Mazatlan.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Leaders of peasant organizations and unions outside the framework of the PRI, as well as opposition party activists, claim that the police frequently make arbitrary arrests, resulting in extended periods of detention.

Following civil disturbances in Acapulco in November 1983, ten members of CONAMUP (National Coordinator of Popular Urban Movements) were arrested for what CONAMUP claimed were fabricated charges. Judicial authorities have responded that those arrested have been charged with damage to property and incitement to riot. On August 30, 1984, the Regional Secretary-General of the United Socialist Party (PSUM) in Jalapa, Veracruz, was arrested along with two party activists and charged with disorderly conduct. Again, the claim was that the charge was fabricated and that the arrest took place for purposes of intimidation. Two weeks earlier, a local PAN municipal council member in the same locality reported that he had been subjected to similar treatment. Rosario Ibarra's committee, during the months of August and September, widely publicized that the Government was holding 315 persons, whom they termed "political prisoners". The Committee stated that 285 of these, the vast majority of whom were peasants who had been involved in peaceful activities over land to which they had proof of ownership, had been jailed during the current Administration. Mexican political observers state that there has been a long history in Mexico of conflict over land, with different factions holding title to the same plots. On October 12, 25 different ethnic Indian groups held a march in Mexico City and presented a list of 150 Indians held in jail in different parts of the country. The demonstrators were appealing for an end to repression in their communities and a respect for their traditions. Both CONAMUP and the CNPA (National Coordinator for the Ayala Plan) demand the release of peasants imprisoned for what they term fictitious crimes. They specifically mention 13 members of an organization of Triqui Indians from Juxtlahuaca, Oaxaca, and seven peasants from the OCEZ (Organization of Peasants Emiliano Zapata).

On October 13, 1984, 11 peasants were freed after having been detained since September, 1983. All 11 are members of the Pacto Riberno, an organization formed to press for reparations from the national oil company, Pemex, for damage to or confiscation of lands in the State of Tabasco. These 11 were among 25 members who, according to the Pacto, had been accused of common crimes.

Amnesty International has adopted as prisoners of conscience four members of COCEI (The Coalition of Workers, Peasants and Students of the Isthmus) including one of its founders, Leopoldo de Gyves Pineda, who have been in prison since December 1983. The four have been charged with offenses against the public order, illegal carrying of arms and incitement to riot. The COCEI claims that the charges are politically motivated, following the forcible ousting of the PSUM/COCEI municipal government of Juchitan, Oaxaca, in July, 1983, (The PSUM/COCEI had won the 1981 election.)

During the annual Labor Day march, May 1, a homemade firebomb was thrown among Mexican dignitaries who were on a balcony of the presidential palace. Police investigators determined that the perpetrators were students at the Popular Preparatory School of Tacuba. On May 5, this institution was taken over by a combination of local police and federal authorities. About 100 students were arrested at the time, though most were released within a few days. Fourteen students were charged with involvement in the May Day incident, and continue to be held by the authorities.

On July 16, Adolfo Aguilar Zinser, a writer and critic of the Government's policy towards Guatemalan refugees, was abducted and held overnight. Neither the abductors nor the facility where he was held were identified, but Aguilar states that he was made to understand that he was being held because of his writing.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Under the Constitution, trial and sentencing must be completed within 12 months of arrest for crimes that would carry at least a two-year sentence. Nevertheless, trial delays are often caused by cumbersome court procedures, and by the defendants' inability or unwillingness to pay bribes in the form of "gratuities" to bring the case to trial. State authorities in some localities are attempting to correct such abuses. In February, 1984 the Governor of the State of Yucatan announced that he had discovered "grave irregularities" in the Office of the Attorney General, centering mainly on the solicitation of bribes. The Governor states that basic changes have been implemented.

Allegations have been made by the political opposition that the failure to bring to trial peasant activists, independent union members and those in the political opposition is politically motivated.

Defendants have a right to counsel and public defenders are available. Although certain sections of the criminal code provide for the convoking of tribunals with juries, in practice this almost never takes place. In most cases, a judge generally acting alone examines written statements, expert opinion, and, less commonly, oral testimony and then makes his decision.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home or Correspondence

Although the Mexican Government generally does not intrude on privacy of individuals, and search warrants are required by law, Mexican human rights activists and members of the political opposition have complained that they are followed by the police and that their telephone lines are tapped. During 1984, there were charges of invasions of peasants' homes by local landowners accompanied by police, without warrants, and allegations that these incidents were sometimes accompanied by robbery, rape, and the burning of homes. The incidents were sometimes connected with the phenomenon of "urban squatters" in Mexican metropolitan areas.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including ### a. Freedom of Speech and of the Press

Freedom of speech and of the press are guaranteed by law. Hand in hand with the Government's efforts to achieve its moral renovation goals, it is tolerating more direct public criticism, and bolder press articles have appeared. Certain topics, such as direct criticism of the President and the military, have traditionally been shunned by most media. At least one foreign journalist has been kept out of the country following such criticism; sources within the Government and local press have stated that this journalist and a colleague will not be allowed to enter Mexico. Overt censorship in other cases has been exercised primarily for the purpose of protecting public morality, be it in print, radio, movies or television. Nevertheless, press sources report that administrations in power influence the press by giving financial supplements to individual reporters for favorable articles, by withholding newsprint and ink (a government monopoly) from critical papers, and by selectively placing government advertising, an important source of income for the press. During the past year, some payments to journalists, reportedly previously abandoned by the de la Madrid Administration, appeared to have been reinstituted, according to local journalists and foreign correspondents based in Mexico. Such subsidies seem to be far less pervasive than during previous administrations, and some of these payoffs are indirect. In the case of advertising, for example, journalists may receive a percentage of the advertising sold to the entities which they cover. Opposition parties and some journalists have publicly accused the PRI's Office of Information of making large payments directly to other journalists. They say that this explains the reduction in direct government subsidies to journalists.

The popular radio program, "Opinion Publica", taken off the air by the previous Administration for broadcasting views critical of the Government, was reinstated in 1983. It currently operates, however, with an altered format, having abandoned live telephone call-ins in favor of recorded calls. In 1983, opposition observers noted that the change was for the purposes of censorship. The outspoken moderator remains the same, and controversial figures, including a person formerly numbered among the disappeared, but recently released, have joined him regularly on the show in 1984.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution grants the right to peaceful assembly for any lawful purpose throughout the country, but a government permit is generally required for major demonstrations. Within the Federal District, opposition political groups, as well as peasant and indigenous organizations, are allowed frequent access to both main boulevards and the city's large central square for demonstrations. During the month of September, Rosario Ibarra de Piedra and a number of opposition deputies engaged in a prolonged hunger strike in support of the disappeared and political prisoners in Mexico. The strike was held within the precincts of the national legislative palace. Numerous demonstrations were held throughout the country in support of the hunger strikers, and most were unmolested. The press reported, however, that on September 25 60 members of the Revolutionary Workers Party were set upon by the judicial and municipal police while holding a supportive sit-in in the main square of Apizaco, a small town in the state of Tlaxcala.

Trade unions enjoy and practice the right to organize, negotiate, and strike. The majority of organized peasants belong to the National Conference of Peasants (CNC), also affiliated with the PRI. Several powerful independent unions also exist. Leaders of these independent unions and peasant organizations have complained of an increase in the level of repression and harassment against them from those bodies associated with the PRI. Campesino groups have charged increased killings and arrests of their leaders and militants, and that their movements and activities are carefully monitored by both municipal and federal police. Some independent unions are associated with opposition parties; on the left with the Unified Socialist Party (PSUM) and the Revolutionary Workers Party (PRT) while those to the right of PRI unions are not connected to any political party. Opposition political leaders have complained that government attempts to unify the two electricity-sector unions has included doing away with a non-PRI union. Others say that the absorption of this union is a natural process of consolidation.

c. Freedom of Religion

Under the Constitution, individuals are free to practice the religion of their choice; however, no religious body has any legal existence. The clergy is prohibited from participating in politics, voting, owning real estate and wearing religious habits in public. Most of these prohibitions are not strictly enforced; neither is a constitutional restriction against pre-university religious schools, many of which exist. In practice the hierarchy of the Catholic church in Mexico maintains a close liaison with the Government. Though Mexico is predominantly Roman Catholic, Protestant and Jewish communities also exist.

Protestant Evangelists, especially from outside Mexico, are active and especially successful in certain rural, largely indigenous communities. In July 1984, state authorities in Chihuahua announced the expulsion of 52 such missionaries over a 98-day period in that state. The Government reportedly charged these missionaries with violating article 130 of the Constitution, which limits the holding of religious services to inside church buildings and homes. Some critics of the action have charged that the Government is selectively enforcing the anti-clerical laws in favor of the predominant Roman Catholic church. Other critics state that, in some outlying areas, the laws are not being enforced against the Evangelists so as to reduce the influence of the Catholic church.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Freedom of movement within and outside the country is unrestricted. Recently, however, because of problems of unrest within Guatemala, some areas along the border have been closed to the public by the military.

Mexico has in the past traditionally followed a liberal asylum policy and its borders have been open to Central Americans fleeing from their countries. During the past year, there has been some attempt to control these entries without closing the southern border. Early in 1984, the Government began to relocate all the refugee camps in the south to the Yucatan Peninsula, stating that this was necessary to protect the refugees from border incursions from Guatemala and to improve their living conditions. Critics of the relocations, however, say that their purpose was to discourage the influx of additional refugees. The number of registered Guatemalan refugees in Mexico in 1984 was officially estimated to have grown to about 47,000. Government spokesmen have stated that there is no plan to encourage the refugees to leave Mexico; however, Mexican authorities have assisted over 600 Guatemalans who have voluntarily returned to Guatemala. Estimates of Salvadoran refugees in Mexico continue to be unavailable from the Government, and Mexico does not consider them to be refugees. The UN High Commissioner for Refugees estimated that 15,000 Salvadorans were present in Mexico in late 1983. The number of Salvadoran political asylees in Mexico has been estimated at less than 100.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Mexico has been governed since 1929 by the PRI, the dominant party. To secure its continuity in power, the PRI has relied on revolutionary legitimacy, cooptation of the opposition, massive government and PRI organizational resources and--opposition parties charge--electoral fraud in some cases. The PRI has broad representation from labor, peasants, and other sectors of society. Opposition parties have recently been able to make inroads, especially among the peasants and the middle class. Election reform laws in 1977 legalized opposition parties beyond those then in existence, and earmarked seats in the state and federal legislatures for opposition parties and guaranteed them access to the public media. President de la Madrid, both in his first and second Annual Report to the nation, emphasized his commitment to political pluralism in Mexico. In the second address, he pointed to the registration of two additional opposition parties, the Authentic Party of the Mexican Revolution (PARM) and the Mexican Workers Party (PMT). Critics have observed, however, that it is in the interest of the PRI to keep the opposition fragmented. They also charge that the PARM joins the ranks of other so-called opposition parties, such as the Popular Socialist Party (PPS), which support the PRI.

The new electoral races in 1984 did not provide a test of this commitment to political pluralism, as effective opposition was not yet sufficiently developed in three of the four states where elections were held. In the state of San Luis Potosi, considered by Mexican political observers to be an area of strength for the National Action Party (PAN), the PRI won. The PAN has attributed this victory to fraud. Despite the opposition's allegations, it is undoubtedly true that a substantial portion of the population throughout Mexico supports and votes for the PRI. In 1984, the PRI initiated primary elections for selection of its candidates in a number of constituencies in order to promote internal party democracy.

A large number of elections for federal deputies and governorships will take place in 1985. The opposition says that the results in states with a developed opposition, such as Sonora, will be a test of the PRI's commitment to political pluralism.

Minority groups, including women and indigenous groups, are allowed full participation in the Mexican political process. Under the law, all citizens 18 and over may vote, though members of the clergy, under the Constitution, are denied this right.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government participates in international human rights forums and allows both domestic and international human rights groups to operate in Mexico without restrictions or harassment. In 1984 Mexico established the Mexican Academy for Human Rights, and hosted the 22-nation First Ibero-American Congress on Political Rights. Mexico also hosted the Fourth Latin American Congress of Families of Detainees and Disappeared (FEDEFAM) in November 1983. Mexico is an active member of the UN Human Rights Commission.

Senior government officials appear to have been responsive to the human rights campaign mounted by Rosario Ibarra de Piedra in September. The Secretariat of the Interior is reportedly investigating at least some of the allegations of disappearances, and Ibarra has been promised an audience with President de la Madrid to discuss the disappeared and political prisoners.

Amnesty International has an office in Mexico and its annual report on human rights is easily available. Its 1984 report, which covered calendar year 1983, was concerned mainly with arbitrary arrest and prolonged incommunicado imprisonment of political prisoners, sentences based on confessions allegedly extracted under torture and ill-treatment, and disappearances. Amnesty was also concerned about information on the arbitrary arrest and murder of members of rural communities and Indian groups, in some cases alleged to have been carried out directly by members of the official security forces, and in others by armed civilians who seemed to be acting in concert with the former. Amnesty's report "Torture in the 80's" states that the most frequent and consistent allegations of torture have been made against the Division of Investigations for the Prevention of Delinquency (DIPD), disbanded by President de la Madrid as one of the first acts of his Administration. Press reports in August stated that the federal judicial police were searching for a torturer employed by the DIPD inside a prison near the Tula River. His identity was established by testimony from the members of the DIPD's Jaguar Group, themselves under indictment.

Freedom House rates Mexico "partly free".

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Mexico's major domestic, economic and social problems are poverty, inflation, a depressed level of economic activity, unemployment, severely uneven income distribution, and a high rate of population growth.

In December 1982, the new de la Madrid Administration began a wide-ranging program to reduce inflation and increase foreign exchange reserves without unduly reducing employment levels in the short term. The longer term objective is to promote a sustainable rate of growth that will reduce unemployment and, hence, poverty. The Government maintains its right to regulate many private economic activities in the public interest. Restrictions regarding the ownership of property by foreigners generally limit foreign equity participation in business enterprises to 49 percent.

Mexico's population in 1984 was estimated at 77.7 million and its population growth rate stood at 2.5 percent in 1984. Life expectancy at birth was 66.3 years and the infant mortality rate was 44.3 per 1,000 live births. Mexico has become an urbanized society, with 67 percent of the population living in cities as of 1980. Over 16 million people live in the Mexico City metropolitan area.

Primary education is both free and obligatory and has been extended to include 10 years of schooling. The primary school enrollment ratio in Mexico was 122.4 percent in 1981 (male 123.8 and female 120.9), reflecting the presence of adults and older children in primary school classes. Adult literacy as of 1980 stood at 83 percent. As of 1984, 58 percent of the population had access to safe water (urban, 61 percent and rural, 51 percent). The average caloric supply as a percent of requirements was 114 percent in 1977. There is no discrimination based on race, religion, sex, ethnic background or political opinion in the availability of food, shelter, health care, and education.

MEXICO

The gross national product per capita was $2,269.40 in 1982. Inflation and unemployment continue to trouble the economy. The Mexican Government contends that open unemployment is 8.0 to 8.5 percent. Underemployment has been estimated by many observers at 30 to 40 percent for several years.

Men and women are equal in principle under the law. Mexican women have the right to file for divorce and separation. There are no travel restrictions on women and they can own property in their own names. Over the past ten years, women have increased their presence in non-traditional occupations. However, the concept of women as mothers and homemakers continues to dominate.

The number of women's action groups is increasing and it appears that the objectives of women are becoming more diversified. Women comprise approximately 26 percent of the work force in urban areas but continue to work predominantly in nonsupervisory jobs with few at the executive level. However, a women is now Secretary-General of the dominant political party. Of the 64 senators elected to the 52nd legislature, six are women; of the 400 federal deputies, 35 are women.

NICARAGUA

A three-man junta--composed of one member of the Sandinista National Directorate, another high-ranking Sandinista member, and one pro-Sandinista Democratic Conservative Party member--served as nominal head of the Government of National Reconstruction throughout 1984. The Junta was formally terminated following the January 1985 inauguration of President Daniel Ortega and Vice President Sergio Ramirez, both former Junta members. Real political power continued to be wielded by the National Directorate of the Sandinista National Liberation Front, a group of nine Marxist revolutionary leaders who took control in July 1979. This body--of which the President is a member--controls policy-making in the Government, and to a large degree, implementation of policy through a parallel party-government structure.

The Sandinistas seized power in 1979, forming a coalition Government with broad popular support and promising to replace the discredited Somoza dictatorship with new social, political and economic systems based on the principles of pluralism, free elections, a mixed economy, and observance of human rights. In the ensuing five years, however, the Government has not fulfilled these promises. It has used intimidation and the restriction of basic human rights to consolidate the power of the Sandinista Front. Though elections were held on November 4, 1984, important sectors of the political opposition declined to participate because of the Government's failure to ensure conditions for a fair and free campaign. Repression and intimidation by government forces against the opposition political parties that did participate in the brief campaign further underscored the unfair nature of the elections.

The Nicaraguan economy is heavily agricultural. Its industrial sector (food processing and some light manufacturing) suffered heavily during the 1978-79 overthrow of Somoza and has yet to recover. Basic foodstuffs widely available in the past are increasingly scarce and subject to rationing. The Government has carried out a number of expropriations which have had a purely political objective. The increasingly state-managed economy, with pervasive controls on prices, credit, imports and exports, and sales of foodstuffs, combined with heavy military expenditures and an often capricious implementation of agrarian reform through expropriation, has negatively affected the middle and upper income groups while producing a decrease in living standards for the poor.

Nicaraguan society is divided into a large working class, composed basically of urban laborers and rural peasants, a small but important middle class, and a minute upper class. The population is overwhelmingly Catholic and the Church is a vigorous institution which serves as one of the country's most influential advocates of human rights. The Government has sought to reduce wide-spread illiteracy and has improved preventive health care for many Nicaraguans, though curative medicine has deteriorated.

The Government continued in 1984 to support terrorist groups in other countries of the region, notably in El Salvador. Honduras and Costa Rica protested Nicaraguan Army incursions and shellings of their territory. Throughout 1984, the Sandinista Government increasingly found itself fighting a civil war against anti-Sandinista guerrillas, which the Government called "counter-revoluntionaries" or "contras" (terms used loosely by the Government to refer to guerrillas and anyone else it chooses to consider "subversive"). Government security forces reportedly tortured and executed persons suspected of assisting the guerrillas, while the Government accused the guerrillas of killing and kidnapping civilians. The Sandinista Army continued arbitrary and sometimes forced military conscription, prompting widespread dissatisfaction and several public protests by Nicaraguan mothers.

During 1984 the Government continued to tighten Sandinista control over Nicaraguan society and to intimidate the remaining opposition. The State of Emergency declared in 1982 remained in effect throughout 1984, although some provisions were modified. The Government continued to use Special Tribunals established outside the judicial system to try cases of suspected subversives. This denies the accused the better, though still flawed, legal protection provided by the regular courts. The Sandinistas continued to rely on organizations controlled by the Sandinista National Liberation Front, such as the ubiquitous "block committees," to help implement their policies at the local level and to exert control, instill loyalty and to identify and implement sanctions against suspected opponents. Using both its own powers and intimidation by Sandinista organizations, the Government systematically harassed opposition political parties, independent labor confederations, the private sector, the Catholic Church, and the independent media. The Government continued prior censorship of the print and electronic media, and cracked down with new vigor in this area after some relaxation during the 1984 campaign period. Sandinista block committees and other organizations frequently disrupted campaign rallies held by opposition political parties, contravening guarantees in the electoral law. The police often did not intervene to prevent such harassment or violence. Through both legal and extra-legal means, the Government continued to seize private property. The 10,000 Miskito Indians forcibly resettled from their Rio Coco homelands in 1982 continued to be prohibited from returning there. About 2,000 more Miskitos fled en masse to Honduras in April and May. There are continuing credible reports that the security forces have tortured and killed Miskito Indians and have confiscated or destroyed their food supply and property.

Two domestic human rights organizations operate in Nicaragua. The Permanent Human Rights Commission (CPDH) is an independent agency established in 1977. It played a key role in exposing human rights violations committed under the Somoza regime. After the Sandinistas came to power in 1979, the CPDH also publicized human rights abuses committed under the new Government. Since 1981, the CPDH has been subject to constant harassment by the Sandinista National Liberation Front, impeding its work but not silencing its voice. The Government founded the National Commission for the Promotion and Protection of Human Rights in 1980. The National Commission claims to be independent, but the Government appoints its members and funds its budget. It is the only organization permitted by the Government to file applications for pardon or to request the review of cases on human rights grounds. It is also charged with reporting incidents of human rights abuses to the proper authorities and promoting the observance of human rights within the Government.

NICARAGUA

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There is credible evidence that the military and security forces were responsible for the deaths of a number of detained persons in 1984. The CPDH documented six such cases, and it estimated that many more went unreported. The Government responded to these accusations by claiming some were "killed while attempting to escape" or "killed while resisting arrest," while others were allegedly guerrillas killed in combat. The CPDH also reported that military and police officials arbitrarily shot a number of suspected subversives. In one case three officials reportedly shot a mentally handicapped farmer who they claimed was a dangerous suspect, though they had no warrant and did not present any charges to the family. Displaced persons reported that military and security forces operating in remote areas summarily executed local peasants whom they suspected were anti-government guerrillas or their sympathizers, sometimes after physically mutilating them. In the section on Nicaragua of its 1984 annual report, the Inter-American Human Rights Commission of the Organization of American States stated, "Concerning the right to live, human rights organizations have continued to denounce violations, especially in the forms of forced disappearances and as a result of the abuse of power by members of the security forces. The Commission has been able to verify that a large number of the denunciations referred to events that took place in the zones of conflict."

The Government claimed that guerrillas killed around 1,000 civilians in 1984. Some civilians have died in the fighting between the Government and the guerillas, although no reliable information is available on their number. Some reportedly died in guerrilla ambushes of government military vehicles carrying civilian passengers. The Government has charged the guerrillas with torturing and summarily executing prisoners. The guerrillas have denied that they target civilians and have asserted that the security forces' indiscriminate use of heavy artillery near population centers has caused civilian casualties.

On January 11, 1984, a Nicaraguan Army patrol crossed into Honduras and killed eleven Nicaraguan Miskito Indians--including three children--at Kiwastara. Honduras protested this and other Nicaraguan Army violations of Honduran territory, as well as Nicaraguan involvement in the infiltration into Honduras of Cuban-trained guerrillas in July 1984. Costa Rica protested several Nicaraguan violations of its territory, including Nicaraguan Army mortar attacks. There is credible evidence that substantial Nicaraguan support for the guerrillas in El Salvador continued to flow during 1984. El Salvador protested continued Nicaraguan material support for the Salvadoran guerrillas, documenting its charges in an August 1984 brief filed with the International Court of Justice.

b. Disappearance

The security forces often hold suspected guerrillas and subversives incommunicado indefinitely without notifying family members. In 1984 the CPDH documented 60 cases of disappearances in which security forces were implicated, but in which the Government would not acknowledge involvement. In some of those cases, though reported in 1984, the individuals had actually disappeared in earlier years. The Government for its part claimed the guerrillas kidnapped many civilians. It is widely believed that many of these alleged kidnappings may have been voluntary desertions to the guerrillas.

Anti-Sandinista guerrilla forces took captive three Sandinista Front members, including Sandinista National Assembly candidate Ray Hooker, on September 5. The guerrillas released all three on October 30 in exchange for three prisoners held by the Government. During 1984, one guerrilla group turned over 54 captured soldiers to the Costa Rican Red Cross.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

In 1984 the CPDH continued to collect evidence of systematic physical and psychological abuse and torture. Prisoners were reportedly kept in cramped, dark cells and fed meals at irregular intervals in order to disorient them, ordered to use only their prison numbers and not their names, and subjected to physical abuse and to threats against their family. One prisoner claimed that food and medical attention were almost nonexistent, and that whatever supplemental foodstuffs were brought in through relatives were stolen by the guards. Another reported that he was kept naked in a cold cell with a ceiling so low he could not stand upright. Other reports alleged prisoners were suspended from the ceiling by their hands during interrogation. Prisoners also reported being beaten with chains, fists and gun butts. It was alleged that, as a form of punishment, one prisoner was placed in a cell with several tuberculoid prisoners. Cases of psychological torture were also frequently reported. Prisoners were forced to listen to the screams of those being tortured, then were told by security officials that the screams came from members of their families. One prisoner was told, falsely, that his family had been arrested by security officials, who forced the spouse to don prison garb. She and her husband were then allowed to see each other but not to converse. Reportedly, security officials physically abused and threatened alleged "subversives" and political suspects. Nicaraguans who fled to Costa Rica reported incidents of rape, torture and murder of children by security and military forces. In the case of Prudencio Baltadano soldiers tied him to a tree and cut off his ears. Interior Minister Thomas Borge admitted that some cases of physical abuse and killings of detained persons by security forces had occurred, but claimed the Government was working to resolve the problem. The National Human Rights Commission also stated that occasional individual abuses of authority had occurred, but insisted that those guilty had been found and punished.

On May 30, 1984, Amnesty International reported in a press release that it had "confirmed that some prisoners have been tortured or ill-treated in Nicaragua." Protests of ill-treatment from individual prisoners or domestic and international organizations have been followed by internal military and police disciplinary hearings, as well as public hearings by criminal courts and courts-martial against police and military personnel alleged responsible. Recent cases include a civil court trial of police officers of the City of Leon, for mistreatment of prisoners. In March a public hearing was held to consider a range of charges against a local military commander and 41 subordinates in the northern department of Jinotega. Sentences of up to the maximum 30 years' imprisonment were handed down in the cases of the commander and 12 others after conviction on a series of charges for abuses, including torture and murder, carried out during counterinsurgency operations in the area in November and December 1983.

In general, Nicaraguan prisons suffer from severe overcrowding. The Government allows the prisoners one visitor every two months and recently announced that those prisoners serving sentences of longer than 10 years would be allowed one visitor every three months. The visitors are allowed to bring food to the prisoners, but no food may be left with the prisoner after the visit. Although conditions are reportedly better in a few prison farms in the Managua area, the CPDH says that these prison farms are used for propaganda purposes and that the only prisoners allowed in them are those whose sentences are almost completed or who have collaborated with the authorities. The CPDH believes that prison conditions in general deteriorated during 1984 and alleges that prisoners' families feared reprisals if they requested reviews of cases or conditions. The CPDH also said that in 1984 it became more difficult to pursue appeals and other legal recourses. The International Committee of the Red Cross made periodic visits to the prisons, providing medical and nutritional assistance and seeing all the prisoners at least once every three months. During 1983 these visits were interrupted, but they resumed in early 1984. However, the Red Cross has not been given access to those detained in special state security facilities separate from the regular prisons. According to Catholic Church officials, priests are denied access to most prison facilities.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention or Exile

According to the Government, there were approximately 5,000 persons in jail, including about 2,000 ex-National Guardsmen or persons accused of cooperation with former President Somoza. The CPDH estimated 900 prisoners had been convicted for "subversive" activities and an additional 500 were being held pending charges.

The 1982 State of Emergency suspended those provisions of the Fundamental Statute promulgated by the Government in 1979 which granted detained persons the right to be held for no more than seven days without arraignment. Habeas corpus was also suspended in security-related cases. Both of these rights were partially restored on August 6, 1984. As anti-government activities increased in 1984, the security forces arrested hundreds of suspects under the Law of Maintenance of Order and Public Security. Open expression of dissent on occasion resulted in harassment or detention. Suspected guerrillas and "subversives" continued to be held in special holding facilities with no access to legal counsel or to domestic or international humanitarian organizations. Some were released after the completion of an investigation lasting from three to six months on the average, others were remanded to the special tribunals, and many simply remained in detention. In 1983 the Government declared that because of the security situation, some former National Guard members had to remain in custody even though they had completed their sentences and this practice continued in 1984. Others held on security charges also remained incarcerated after they had been exonerated or had served their sentences. Former Minister of Defense Bernardino Larios, charged in 1981 with plotting the assassination of Sandinista leaders, was held for three years until the Supreme Court overturned his conviction and ordered his release. Larios was held an additional 40 days before the Government finally honored the release order, and after his release, he was refused permission to leave the country and was subjected to other government-inspired harassment. The Inter-American Human Rights Commission's 1984 annual report called attention to, "numerous detainees holding release orders issued by a competent judge, but who are kept in prison for prolonged periods, with no reason given for the detention. Situations such as the above represent a violation of the right to personal freedom and to due process, and they must be remedied promptly to lend substance to the Nicaraguan Government's statements concerning the independence and authority of the country's judiciary. The Commission repeats, with respect to the right to a trial and to due process, that the remedy of habeas corpus or amparo may not be suspended as it has been in Nicaragua."

In 1984 the Government extended indefinitely the amnesty originally granted in December 1983 to Miskito Indians from northern Nicaragua and certain exiles and "counterrevolutionaries." Nevertheless, the CPDH documented the cases of 60 Miskito Indians who remained jailed in 1984. Notwithstanding the CPDH's repeated inquiries, the Government gave it only partial responses in 17 of the cases. In one case the Government claimed the prisoner had been released, but prison officials told relatives the prisoner had merely been transferred to another facility. Moravian Church officials claimed to know of an additional 24 Atlantic Coast residents being held in Nicaraguan prisons on political charges. In late 1984, the Government began talks with leaders of one of the Miskito Indian guerrilla groups.

The Government does not specifically exile dissidents. Many opposition leaders and activists have fled on their own, however, and fear they would be imprisoned if they returned. In a May 30, 1984 press release, Amnesty International reiterated its longstanding concern about the "detention of prisoners of conscience, deficiencies in trial proceedings, and limitations on the right of appeal to sentences handed down by Special Tribunals created to try some categories of prisoners." In its 1984 annual report, Amnesty International stated that, "Many supporters of legal political parties, trade union organizations, and other bodies opposing government policies were detained for questioning for periods ranging from several hours to over one month of incommunicado detention, before being released without charge. Amnesty International believed that a pattern of harassment emerged from the detention of trade union members and other suspected opponents of the government for short periods of questioning. Many such detainees subsequently reported being threatened that they would be detained again for prolonged periods under the Public Order Law if they did not assist the security forces or resign from certain lawful organizations."

The CPDH believes that the disappearances, noted in section 1b in which security forces were implicated, involve "a deliberate policy of keeping prisoners incommunicado and at the mercy of their captors, undergoing all sorts of physical and psychological abuse."

e. Denial of a Fair Public Trial

Under the 1979 Fundamental Statute, the judiciary was to be an autonomous branch of government, an independence generally exercised in ordinary criminal cases. In cases where the accused was charged with "counterrevolutionary" or "subversive" activity, however, judges have routinely decided in favor of the prosecution. Nevertheless, some judges have continued to exercise limited independence. For example, the Supreme Court ruled in January that the conviction of former Defense Minister Bernardino Larios was improper, due to an absence of convincing evidence, and ordered that the prisoner be freed.

In April 1983 the Government established special "Popular Anti-Somocista Tribunals" to handle the rapidly growing number of cases of accused guerillas and "subversives." These tribunals, which became increasingly active in 1984, operate outside the conventional judicial system, and their decisions cannot be appealed to the regular court system. The members of the tribunals are selected from the ranks of Sandinista organizations, and only the president of each tribunal is required to be a lawyer. Persons tried in these courts have the right to counsel and to introduce evidence, but the tribunals are granted great discretionary powers in determining whether evidence is admissible and whether it is sufficient for conviction. The proceedings of the tribunals are declared to be open to the public, but in some cases attendance is restricted. Trials have reportedly been scheduled with little advance notice, limiting opportunities for the accused to prepare his defense. Often the prisoners, even after "confessing" to state security officials, have been held under investigation for three to six months before being suddenly brought to trial. Since all Special Tribunal cases are tried in Managua, witnesses who live in other areas of the country are hard-pressed to attend trials on time. In its 1984 annual report, the Inter-American Human Rights Commission wrote that, "The procedures followed by the Anti-Somoza Courts give rise to serious doubts with respect to observance of the norms that guarantee due process." According to the CPDH, during the first ten months of 1984 the tribunals had adjudicated the cases of approximately 620 prisoners, of whom about 90 percent were found guilty and sentenced to up to the maximum penalty of 30 years in prison. In one case a prisoner was sentenced to seven years, and upon appealing to another tribunal was sentenced to an additional eight years, reportedly for having made recourse to the services of the CPDH.

In 1984, as in past years, the Government made use of national television and radio to accuse suspected "subversives." In April, state security officials used this method to accuse a priest, a doctor and several members of an independent union of arms trafficking and sabotage.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family Home, and Correspondence

The Government has developed an elaborate and effective security and intelligence network employing both government agencies, such as the security forces, and Sandinista party organizations, particularly the "Sandinista Defense Committees," to ferret out dissidents and suspected "subversives." The Sandinista Defense Committees, organized in most neighborhoods throughout the country, serve as a network of informers and as an instrument of pervasive political control and intimidation--they are self-described as the "eyes and ears of the Revolution." Participation in the Defense Committees is supposed to be voluntary. However, the Sandinistas employ many methods to entice or pressure individuals into joining, including Committee control over the distribution of ration cards for the purchase of basic products such as rice, beans, and soap. While many who do not participate in Sandinista activities suffer no ill effects, others are arbitrarily branded as politically suspect or are denounced by Sandinista activists as subversives. People who criticize the "revolutionary process" or its leadership may be subjected to pressure ranging from public ridicule and defacement of their homes by Sandinista mobs to loss of employment and even detention. There have been reports that members of the Sandinista youth group have denounced teachers for their political views, whereupon the teachers have been fired.

As the November elections approached, the Government made it increasingly difficult for citizens to remain neutral. Mobs composed of scores of Sandinista Front supporters demonstrated at the homes and offices of opposition figures, chanting slogans and threats, and defacing buildings with pro-Government graffiti. The mobs sometimes resorted to violence, vandalizing nearby cars, beating people, and disrupting opposition political rallies during the electoral campaign. Such mobs heightened the climate of fear in which critics of the regime lived and worked. The Government took no responsibility for these actions. It stated that it regarded them as "legitimate expressions of the popular will" and did not interfere to protect the rights of those victimized by them. In September, government agents closed several technical schools in Leon, transported the students to Chinandega, where they were directed against high school students, mostly female, who were marching in protest against the draft. A number of the girls were badly beaten. The Government also showed on occasion that it could stop such activity when it wished to do so. When several days of intense mob activity in September aimed at disrupting political rallies by opposition candidate Arturo Cruz focused wide international attention on the Government's use of such techniques, a subsequent opposition party rally took place with no interference whatsoever.

There are credible reports that under-age Nicaraguan males have been impressed into military services, including, in some cases, boys younger than 15. The Inter-American Human Rights Commission concluded in its 1984 annual report that, "On many occasions, young people who are ineligible under the very terms of that law that created the service have been drafted into it. Furthermore, it has been pointed out that this recruitment takes place not only for reasons of national defense but also as a means of political indoctrination of those drafted into the ranks of the army." In November in the town of Chinandega, an estimated 3,000 young men were forcibly taken from their homes in handcuffs, during a massive forced conscription effort.

On December 24, 1984, government agents forcibly entered the Costa Rican Embassy and removed a Nicaraguan youth who had sought asylum there. Costa Rica vigorously protested this action.

The State of Emergency suspended the legal requirement for a search warrant. Police and state security officials regularly enter and search private residences. The Government opens private mail and intercepts both incoming and outgoing international mail. Officials inspect the baggage and personal effects of both arriving and departing international travelers and confiscate items of literature, including newspapers from neighboring countries alleged to be subversive.

In late 1981 and early 1982 the Government forcibly relocated about 10,000 Miskito Indians from their homelands to distant resettlement camps. During 1984 the Government refrained from further relocations but refused to permit those Indians already displaced to return to their homelands. Relocation camp residents are allowed to fish and hunt but are prohibited from using firearms unless they belong to the Sandinista militia. They reportedly cannot go more than two kilometers from their camps without government permission. Even their canoes, upon which they rely for their livelihood and transportation, must be registered with the Government. Residents are paid for agricultural work with food rather than money. There continued to be credible reports of food shortages and malnutrition in the resettlement camps during 1984. In its July 1984 "Report on the Situation of Human Rights of a Segment of the Nicaraguan Population of Miskito Origin," the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights concluded that, "hundreds of Miskitos have been arbitrarily detained without any formalities and under vague accusations of carrying out 'counterrevolutionary activities;' many of these detentions have been followed by prolonged periods of incommunicado imprisonment and in some cases the Commission has verified that illegal torture and abuse took place." The Commission also stated that, "With respect to the destruction of the homes, crops, livestock and other belongings of the Miskitos at the time of the relocation, Government officials themselves have recognized that these acts took place."

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Government continued to maintain prior censorship of both the printed and electronic media throughout 1984. The only independent source of news in the country is the newspaper La Prensa. Since 1979, 20 independent radio news programs have gone off the air as a result of government censorship. Currently, all radio news programs, the two television channels, and two of the three daily newspapers either support or are controlled by the Government. The Government expelled a correspondent from the Spanish news agency EFE in March 1984. While there is no censorship of domestic or imported books, few books from the West are on sale in Nicaraguan book stores, which are stocked almost entirely with publications from Communist countries. Censorship of La Prensa in 1984 continued to be capricious and increased sharply by the end of the year. Government censors cut articles ranging from reports on democratic leaders, the expulsion of 10 foreign priests, a conversation with government guest Jesse Jackson and Costa Rican visas. Though a July 19 government decree proclaimed that censorship would continue only on matters of national security, censorship in fact continued on internal political matters, economic problems, human rights, and many other non-security related issues. Shortly after this decree was issued, the Government informed private radio station owners that all radio news remained subject to prior censorship.

La Prensa editors estimate that between January and October 1984 the Government censored 20 percent of their stories on current national and international events. The paper did not appear on at least 14 occasions in 1984 in response to heavy censorship. Following the elections, the Government doubled its censorship of La Prensa, with an average of ten censored articles per day in November. A La Prensa photographer and a journalist were detained for several months for alleged "subversive" acts. La Prensa charged that the Government also continued to harass its distributors outside Managua. The Government continued to insist that the sermons of Managua Archbishop Obando y Bravo be submitted to censors at the Ministry of Interior prior to live radio broadcast. The Church has refused to do this, and the Archbishop's sermons are no longer heard live on the radio, although they are printed in La Prensa and subsequently rebroadcast. In July the censors threatened to shut down Radio Catolica (the Catholic Church radio station) because it deviated from scheduled programming to play religious music as a tribute to 10 priests expelled by the Government.

The Government's imposition of "curriculum rationalization and coordination" on the two Nicaraguan universities has limited their autonomy in developing their curricula and has further circumscribed academic freedom. The Ministry of Education has imposed on primary and secondary schools as well curricula with a strong ideological content. The Sandinista youth organization is a pervasive influence in the public education system, and has reportedly paid for some members' tuition in private schools in order to have the organization represented there. Sandinista youth members allegedly have denounced teachers for not supporting the Government.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The 1982 State of Emergency Decree suspended the right of assembly, but the Government allowed opposition groups to hold indoor meetings. Small demonstrations, including one commemorating the anniversary of the death of former La Prensa editor Joaquin Chamorro, were also allowed. However, in July the Government reacted to a Catholic Church-organized march in support of a priest accused of "counterrevolutionary activities" by expelling ten foreign Catholic priests. On July 19, the fifth anniversary of the Nicaraguan Revolution, Junta Coordinator Daniel Ortega announced that the right of free assembly would be restored to those opposition political parties that registered for the November elections. Nevertheless, registered political party rallies and marches were subjected to frequent and often violent interruption by Sandinista mobs.

When students in Chinandega marched in August to protest against military conscription, the Government reportedly made teachers personally responsible to ensure their students did not participate in future demonstrations. At least one of the schools from which these students came has since been threatened with closure. Political meetings held indoors by non-registered political parties were also subjected to mob attacks. None of the restrictions applied to pro-government organizations, which held frequent open-air rallies throughout the year. Students in public schools were released from school early and obliged to participate in some Sandinista rallies, as were government workers and members of the armed forces.

The Government has attempted to weaken the independent labor movement while creating alternative labor bodies controlled by the Sandinista Front. It controls most of the 20 to 30 percent of the total workforce which is organized. The Sandinista Front's two principal confederations, the Sandinista Workers' Central (CST) and the Association of Rural Workers (ATC), have over 120,000 members and dwarf the non-Sandinista organizations, which have about 40,000. In theory, the Sandinista unions serve as a conduit for workers' desires and grievances to the Government. In fact, these confederations consistently support government policies such as strict labor discipline and worker participation in defense activities.

Approximately 60 members of the independent Nicaraguan Workers' Central (CTN) were detained during the year, some for as long as four months. At least six CTN members formerly convicted of "subversive" activity were pardoned by the Council of State in 1984. Twelve members remained in detenion at year's end. Police entered and searched the Managua headquarters of the CTN on May 24, taking with them several documents, and returned later and arrested several members of the union. The independent Confederation for Labor Unification (CUS) was subject to similar government harassment. On May 1, a Sandinista mob entered a CUS school and damaged some of its equipment. In September, two CUS members who reportedly received logistical support from the Government occupied the CUS headquarters and called for its withdrawal from the Coordinadora, a coalition of groups opposing the Government. When Confederation leaders attempted to hold a meeting to discuss the issue, pro-government mobs interrupted the proceedings. In the resulting melee several injuries occurred. The police then occupied the headquarters briefly before returning the building to the CUS.

The Government requires that the Labor Ministry participate in collective bargaining and approve any labor-management contract; until August, strikes were illegal. On August 6 the Government restored the right to strike. Shortly thereafter, a Sandinista union called a strike. Further labor unrest was cut short by government warnings--supported by the Sandinista Workers' Central--that strikes or work stoppages were threats to national security and would not be tolerated. In a September 8 speech, Sandinista Front National Directorate member Victor Tirado declared that, "The strike as a weapon, as a political instrument of the working class, has already passed into history."

The major labor confederations maintained ties with recognized international labor bodies. The CST is a member of the Soviet-aligned World Federation of Trade Unions. The Christian Democrat-oriented CTN is affiliated with the Latin American Confederation of Workers. The CUS is a member of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions as well as a member of several regional organizations. The Government designated the ATC to represent Nicaraguan labor at the 1984 International Labor Organization Conference in Geneva.

c. Freedom of Religion

Catholicism is practiced by about 80 percent of the population. Although a number of other faiths are legal and operate freely, the Government has harassed and expropriated property from certain faiths, such as the Seventh-Day Adventists, Mennonites, Jehovah's Witnesses, Mormons, Jews, and the Moravian Church.

Initially highly supportive of Sandinista, the Catholic Church has become increasingly disenchanted with Sandinista policies. Most of the clergy, led by Managua Archbishop Miguel Obando y Bravo, wish to remain independent of the Government and are increasingly critical of it. At the same time, a minority faction which terms itself the "Popular Church" is strongly pro-Sandinista. The division between this faction and the rest of the Church is based partly on theological issues, but also reflects the ongoing struggle between the Church and the Sandinista Government over the direction of post-Somoza Nicaragua. The Government has harassed the Church repeatedly, and the bishops are regularly attacked in the government and pro-government press. The Church has resisted government efforts to assert greater control over Catholic schools. The Government, which had banned Obando Y Bravo's televised masses in 1981, continued to prohibit the live broadcast over radio of his Sunday sermons during 1984. In April the Government delayed the publication of a pastoral letter of the Catholic Church's Espiscopal Conference calling for national reconciliation, and conducted a bitter campaign against the Church hierarchy in the government media. Sandinista mobs harassed persons attending some Catholic Church events, and on one occasion set fire to weeds surrounding a church and hung a Sandinista union flag from the steeple. In late June the Government accused a priest of subversive activity and restricted him to a local seminary. When priests in Managua undertook a brief protest march in support of the accused priest, Interior Ministry officials responded by expelling ten foreign priests--including some who had not taken part in the march--and canceling their residence permits. The Government also refused to grant residence permits to some foreign priests and nuns working in Nicaragua. On several occasions, the Government refused to honor visas issued to priests and denied them entrance into the country. The Government has also on at least two occasions attempted to place priests in sexually embarassing situations which could be manipulated to discredit the church hierarchy. In 1982 such an attempt was made against Church spokesman Monsignor Bismarck Carballo, and in 1984 against a visiting Venezuelan bishop and two other priests. The Inter-American Human Rights Commission found that, "Although it is true that much of the friction between the Government and the churches arises from positions that are directly or indirectly linked to the political situation of the country, it is also true that statements by high government officials, official press statements, and the actions of groups under the control of the Government have gone beyond the limits within which political discussion should take place and have become obstacles to certain specifically religious activities."

Some smaller denominations continued to be persecuted for spreading allegedly subversive ideas and for collaborating with "counterrevolutionaries." Several properties that Sandinista mobs had seized in 1982 from the Seventh Day Adventists, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, the Mennonites and Jehovah's Witnesses remained under government control throughout 1984. Two members of the Jehovah's Witnesses were detained in August, and others requested protection from the courts because of harassment by Interior Ministry officials.

The 1978-79 insurrection and government policies since 1979 led virtually all of the approximately 50 members of the Jewish community to leave the country. In 1984 the Government maintained its 1983 offer to restore the Managua synagogue--which the Government had earlier confiscated--to the Jewish community, in response to repeated efforts by the Anti-Defamation League of the B'nai B'rith. The Government also agreed in principle to review one case of a member of the Jewish community whose property had been confiscated, but thus far has refused to restore the property or to offer compensation. The Government continues to maintain close ties with the Palestine Liberation Organization and maintains strong anti-Israel and anti-Zionist positions in international organizations.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Immigration and Repatriation

On July 19, 1984, the Government announced it would guarantee freedom of travel throughout the country as part of its electoral campaign program. However, military and security forces in 1984 continued to operate numerous checkpoints, particularly in the northwestern areas of the country, and access to some areas was often temporarily restricted because of military activity. For example, the entire Atlantic Coast region remained a restricted military area, and individuals continue to require Interior Ministry permission to travel there.

The Government requires exit visas for all Nicaraguan citizens and residents who desire to leave the country. After the elections in late 1984, it blocked the departure from the country of at least 22 opposition leaders and members. Following intense international criticism, it subsequently authorized some of these people to travel abroad. In January 1985, the Government announced that tickets for foreign travel must be purchased in U.S. dollars. Since the sale of foreign currency is strictly controlled by the Government--and is usually unavailable to the general public--the result may be to curtail opposition travel abroad.

The Government continued in 1984 to confiscate the property of Nicaraguans who remained out of the country for periods of six months or more. It has not, however, permanently blocked the return of Nicaraguan citizens, nor has it taken action against non-Nicaraguans returning to Nicaragua from other countries. Neither has it revoked the citizenship of opposition leaders in exile, though it did begin criminal proceedings against a number of leaders of the armed opposition. The Government has, however, denied entry to several foreign priests, notwithstanding their possession of valid Nicaraguan visas. It also canceled the residence permits of 10 foreign priests in June and has refused to grant resident status to other foreign priests working in Nicaragua.

During 1984 thousands of Nicaraguans left the country, joining the tens of thousands who have abandoned the country since 1979. Between January and May 1984 an estimated 1,500 youths between 17 and 25 fled Nicaragua to avoid military conscription. Several thousand Miskitos crossed into Honduras during the year, including 2,000 who fled en masse in April and May. The flow of displaced persons from the north central departments continued due to heavy fighting. Many also left for Costa Rica as fighting continued in the south.

Nicaragua has received over 20,000 displaced persons since 1979, nearly all from El Salvador. The Government works closely with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees to provide food, clothing, and shelter for these people and attempts to integrate them into society. It does not forcibly repatriate displaced persons.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The Sandinista Front declares that it is a "vanguard party" with a historic right to rule. Its nine-man National Directorate has ruled Nicaragua through the Junta of Government, the cabinet ministries, and the Council of State, a quasi-legislative body. In all three bodies the Sandinistas have a decisive majority. For example, the Junta was composed of Sandinista Directorate member Daniel Ortega (the new President), Sandinista member Sergio Ramirez (the new Vice-President), and Democratic Conservative Party member Rafael Cordova Rivas. Daniel Ortega's brother Humberto, a fellow member of the Sandinista National Directorate, is Minister of Defense and Commander-in-Chief of the Sandinista Popular Army. Of the other seven Sandinista National Directorate members, three head the Ministries of Interior (including the security forces), Planning, and Agriculture. Another is President of the Council of State; yet another is Vice-Minister of Interior. All major appointments in the Government are made by the Sandinista National Directorate, acting through the Junta of Government. The National Directorate has also determined the allocation of seats in the Council of State, ensuring unchallenged Sandinista Front domination of that body. The Sandinista Front's victory in the November 1984 elections will continue its control through the Presidency and the new National Assembly, which replaced the Junta and the Council of State in January 1985.

Thirteen political parties exist in Nicaragua. The Government routinely harasses the opposition parties through the detention of party members and activists, mob action against party headquarters, threats, prohibition of large rallies, denial of exit visas, and censorship. A number of activists from opposition parties were detained during 1984 on politically motivated grounds. The Democratic Conservative Party obtained the release of approximately 60 imprisoned members, but claims another 140 remain in jail. Several members of the Social Christian Party were also detained and harassed.

The Government sought to improve its international image through the process culminating in the November 1984 presidential and National Assembly elections. Parties that registered for the elections were allowed to share 30 minutes per week on national television and 45 minutes per week of radio time during the three-month campaign. Each registered political party was also given nine million cordobas (approximately $320,000) to finance its campaign. In theory parties were allowed freedom of assembly and expression; in practice the Government frequently violated these rights. The Government specifically excluded the armed opposition from participating in the elections. Despite the Government's guarantees, pro-government forces repeatedly harassed the opposition parties throughout the campaign. Press censorship continued, including coverage of opposition rallies and statements. Opposition party youth activists were detained by the police, and in some cases were even drafted into the Armed Forces. Pro-government demonstrations repeatedly and sometimes violently disrupted opposition rallies without punishment or sanction of any kind. On one occasion a member of the Militia fired into an opposition meeting, injuring two persons. The Supreme Electoral Council, required by law to supervise the campaign process, did little to correct the situation.

Deeply skeptical of government objectives, and disturbed by government violations of the existing campaign rules, the principal democratic opposition group--known as the Coordinadora--conditioned its participation on the existence of adequate electoral conditions, including full freedom of assembly and of the press, access to the voter registration process, and the postponement of the elections to allow all parties to have at least 90 days in which to campaign. During Socialist International-sponsored negotiations in October 1984 between the Government and the Coordinadora, the Government initially accepted but then rejected these conditions. Consequently, the Coordinadora, led by presidential candidate Arturo Cruz, maintained its boycott of the elections.

The Independent Liberal Party also voted to withdraw from the elections, but the Government refused to take it off the ballot. In addition, Sandinista Front members interrupted a meeting of the Democratic Conservative Party to prevent a decision to join the election boycott. Of the remaining four non-Sandinista parties that were on the electoral ballot, three were small Marxist parties with little popular support. Consequently, the Nicaraguan people were denied a broad range of opposition parties for whom to vote. The 1984 report of the Inter-American Human Rights Commission stated that, "The Commission has been able to verify that during the current electoral process, the Sandinista National Liberation Front has intensively used all of the resources made available to it by its holding of state power, which places it in an advantageous position with respect to other contenders. In this regard, the denounced harassment of political and union leaders is unacceptable. Furthermore, the IACHR considers that some candidates have been excluded, which could have been avoided if there had been greater flexibility, both on the part of the candidates and the Government."

With these serious shortcomings in the process, the Government party--the Sandinista Front--won the flawed elections with 62 percent of the vote. Many foreign observers reported that the balloting appeared to be orderly and honest, although some observers claimed that voter participation was lower than official figures indicated. In about two-thirds of the polling places there were poll watchers only from the Sandinista Front. About 25 percent of the registered voters failed to vote, and about 7 percent of the votes were declared improperly marked. Notwithstanding the Government's professed interest in allowing opposition participation in political life, following the elections it increased press censorship and restricted foreign travel by opposition leaders.

NICARAGUA

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation Of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government undertook a commitment to the Organization of American States in July 1979 to observe human rights, as well as to respect pluralism and to hold free elections. The Government professes to be proud of its human rights record and says it officially welcomes the scrutiny of the international community. During 1983 a team from the Inter-American Human Rights Commission of the OAS visited Nicaragua to conduct a follow-up investigation on the treatment of Miskito Indians in the Atlantic Coast region. In a report and resolution released in June 1984, the Commission provided further documention of government violations of the Indians' human rights and terminated its role as a friendly mediator between the Miskitos and the Government.

The government-sponsored National Commission for the Promotion and Protection of Human Rights (established in 1980) continues to be the only organization recognized by the Government as competent to file applications for pardons or to request the review of cases on human rights grounds. During 1984 it brought about the release of approximately one hundred political prisoners, most in the week preceding the November 4 elections. The independent CPDH suffered continued harassment from the Government in 1984, including the detention of its workers and interference with the distribution of its reports. The Government refuses to deal directly with the CPDH or to acknowledge complaints submitted through it. Although lawyers acting on behalf of the CPDH frequently are denied access to prisoners, it nevertheless continues to collect data and to publish detailed reports.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Nicaragua had a population of roughly 3,400,000 in 1984. According to the World Bank, its per capita gross national product in 1981 was $860 and its population growth rate was 3.9 percent (1970-81), although the Government reports a population growth rate of 3.3 percent. Nicaraguans have a life expectancy at birth of 59.8 years. Zero or negative economic growth is expected in 1984. In 1983, exports were about $430 million compared to the pre-1979 level of $650 million. Imports were $803 million in 1984. Foreign assistance decreased sharply in 1984, most of it coming from the Soviet bloc. Inflation for 1984 was about 60-80 percent. About 20 percent of the work force was unemployed.

Serious economic mismanagement, declining exports and guerrilla activity contributed to Nicaragua's economic problems in 1984. The lack of political stability and investor confidence contributed to the stagnation of the economy. The Nicaraguan private sector, which accounts for approximately 60 percent of gross domestic product, is very closely controlled by the Government, which has, inter alia, a monopoly on foreign trade and on bank credit. Although government leaders have reiterated their intention to foster a mixed economy, arbitrary property confiscations and the Government's Marxist rhetoric have discouraged private investment. There were numerous instances during the year of arbitrary confiscation of land for political reasons.

The Government made efforts during the year to improve health services. Campaigns in 1984 provided vaccinations for several common diseases, reportedly resulting in the elimination of polio and a decrease in malaria cases. Medicine provided in hospitals and health centers is free, although a lack of foreign exchange shortages has resulted in extreme shortages of medicines. New health centers and regional hospitals were constructed. The infant mortality rate reportedly was reduced to 65.2 deaths per 1,000 live births in 1984. According to government figures, about 95 percent of the urban population and 12 percent of the rural population have access to safe water. World Bank statistics from 1976 stated that 70 percent of the population had access to safe water. The Government claimed to have 10 percent of the population on social security rolls in 1984, and to have raised literacy to 88 percent. The adjusted primary school enrollment ratio in 1983 was 73 percent. According to 1978 World Bank figures, 85 percent of school-age children were enrolled in primary schools.

Women are active at all levels of society and at all but the highest levels of the Government and the Sandinista Front. There is one woman on the Supreme Court and one woman Cabinet Minister. Women have served as national coordinators of one of the opposition parties as well as of the Permanent Human Rights Commission. A large number of seats on the Council of State are filled by women. Participation of women in the military is voluntary.

PANAMA

Panama is officially again a representative democracy in which the security apparatus is subordinate to civilian authority and internationally accepted standards of human rights are the law. An elected Government under President Barletta was sworn in on October 11, 1984, to a five-year term. A new 67-member legislature took office on November 16.

From 1968 to 1978 political power was concentrated almost entirely in the hands of the Panamanian National Guard (since 1983 the Panama Defense Forces or PDF). From 1978 onwards there was a gradual opening of the political process, and a declared intention to return to the practice of representative democracy by 1984, though during this period the PDF has continued to exercise effective control through surrogates.

The 1984 national elections saw large voter turnout, and were themselves peaceful and orderly. However, incidents of violence marred the aftermath, including PDF complicity alleged by opposition and independent observers in the shooting deaths of two demonstrators during a confrontation between pro-government and opposition elements. The prolonged vote tabulation process was marked by irregularities, and drew pointed charges of fraud from the opposition coalition. After an interval of two weeks the Supreme Electoral Tribunal declared the official Government-backed coalition candidate the winner by 1713 votes, or 0.29 percent over his opponent. The opposition coalition rejected these results as invalid.

The new President, Nicholas Ardito Barletta, has pledged his Government's support for the principles of democracy and civilian control, and has expressed personal concern over the incidents of violence associated with the election. The PDF has declared its intention to retire from an active political role, and to concentrate on national security and civic action missions. For the first time since 1968, the new directly-elected legislature has significant powers to introduce, debate, and pass new legislation, as well as to ratify treaties and international agreements. While accusations of fraud were made by both sides in the legislative elections, the opposition did win a significant minority of seats.

Panama, a middle-income developing country, has a mixed economy which has suffered severely from the worldwide recession; the 20 percent unemployment rate is a serious problem. The immediate priorities of the Barletta Government are to improve the economic situation and to reduce unemployment. More long-range goals include reducing the role of the PDF and cleaning up corruption. Panama's private sector and entrepreneurial class are active and influential, and individuals are generally speaking free to hold private property and to pursue private interests. Human, social, economic, and political rights are not restricted because of minority or other distinctive status, although there is an historical cultural/linguistic bias against English-speaking blacks of Antillean descent.

The inviolability of the individual, family, home and property enshrined in Panama's Constitution and laws is generally honored in practice. Infrequent exceptions over the years appear to be isolated incidents, and do not constitute a consistent, deliberate pattern of human rights violations. Civil and civic rights such as freedom of assembly, expression, and religion are also protected by law and generally honored in practice.

Long-term human rights trends in Panama are positive. The publicly expressed dedication of the new Government to the principles of human rights and the evolution of democratic practice suggest that these trends will continue.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

On May 7, one day after the general elections, violence erupted in front of the Legislative Palace where election returns were being tabulated. Graphic photos show gunmen firing into the largely oppositionist crowd. The incident resulted in the deaths of two opposition supporters and over forty injuries, some due to gun shots, others to beatings by accomplices of the gunmen. Uniformed police (PDF) on the scene were either unable or unwilling to halt the violence. According to the opposition press, the gunmen belonged to a group of thugs employed by PDF security forces to support the PRD. Some of the gunmen were promptly arrested; the leader of the group, Silverio Brown, was himself shot to death by police detectives on August 7, allegedly while trying to escape. Opposition groups and gang members claiming former employment with the PDF have charged that Brown was killed to suppress knowledge of a PDF role in the May 7 incident. Twenty other members of the group were said still to be in preventive detention at year's end. The Brown case apparently led several other presumed group members to seek refuge in foreign embassies. One of these, Angel Vasell Rock, sought diplomatic asylum in the Venezuelan Embassy. According to statements in the opposition press attributed to Vasell Rock, he escaped from a bus conveying the gang members to a Panamanian prison, where, he claimed, they were all to be shot, and made his way back to Panama City to seek diplomatic protection. After several weeks of negotiations between Panama and Venezuela, Vasell Rock left the Embassy under a guarantee that he would not be harmed, and entered police custody. He is charged with a number of common crimes unrelated to the post-election violence.

b. Disappearance

On May 18, the press reported that several bystanders had witnessed the arrest of Edwin Eredio Amaya Bravo in Chiriqui Province by members of the PDF on a counterinsurgency training exercise. Amaya's family lawyer filed a writ of habeas corpus against the Commander of the PDF before the Panamanian Supreme Court, but the PDF denied ever having arrested Amaya. In September Amaya's brother wrote the PDF Commander to express his fear that his brother had been killed. To date, no results have been made public of a supposedly ongoing police investigation of this reported disappearance.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution prohibits measures that harm the physical, mental or moral integrity of persons under detention.

Opposition sources have publicly charged that billy-clubs and electric prods were used on those detained October 10 following the violent dispersal in Panama City of an all-night opposition vigil, related to continuing objections to the elections. The opposition further charged that those detained were forced to move across the floor of the police station on their knees during questioning, and were threatened with additional beatings if they did not comply. Newspaper photographs taken shortly after their release show arrestees from the vigil with what appear to be contusions. On May 30, in response to the burning of a government-owned bus in front of opposition headquarters, PDF personnel sacked the opposition's offices. Photographs of that incident show beatings of opposition activists and bystanders.

In 1984, there were several allegations by the opposition of police beatings of detainees awaiting trial in the Coiba Penal Colony. In September, a newspaper report denounced human rights violations in the Women's Penitentiary in Panama City, alleging that prisoners were punished by being forced to sleep on cement slabs and given reduced food rations.

Overcrowding in Panama's prisons continues to be a major problem. The average population of the Central Men's Prison in Panama City, built in 1925 to accommodate 225, is now well over 700, and most detainees sleep on the floor. The Government attributes this to lack of economic resources to build new and more adequate prisons. Supplemental foodstuffs and other prison services not normally provided may be purchased by those able to afford them.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution provides for habeas corpus and requires warrants for arrest, except for those arrested while committing a crime. The Constitution does not allow preventive detention, but in many cases the Government appeal of a granting of bail can take weeks or months to be finally adjudicated. During this time the detainee must remain behind bars. Amendments to the Constitution in 1983 strengthened procedural safeguards for arrested individuals. The police must bring charges against the accused at the time he is arrested or served with a summons. Failure to make such charges personally to the accused has led to invalidation of sentences. Those under arrest must also be immediately informed of their constitutional rights. Once arrested, a suspect may be held for no more than 24 hours without being charged and brought before a magistrate. Opposition groups have claimed that detainees have been held incommunicado up to a week after arrest before being brought before a magistrate, but there are no recent confirmed instances of this.

An accused may be held in custody after being charged for as long as it takes to conduct the investigation and bring the case to trial. Pretrial detention, especially for people from lower economic classes, can last for months or even years. Such time is credited against any sentence imposed following conviction.

Shortly after general elections in May, two commentators for opposition Radio Hit in Colon were arbitrarily detained without charges being brought against them. They were released after one and five days respectively. In the first incident, a school principal was held incommunicado for 24 hours despite efforts by his lawyer and Radio Hit's owner to talk with him. In the second incident, the commentator, who was also correspondent for the opposition newspaper La Prensa in Colon, allegedly was physically hauled before the Mayor of Colon and, according to eyewitnesses, beaten in the Mayor's office. According to opposition sources, other supporters were arbitarily detained for short periods of time during and after the electoral period, and later released without having been charged.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Persons charged with crimes are presumed innocent until proven guilty and have the right of counsel. The local Bar Association, while underfunded, provides a public defender service for the indigent. In civil cases, the Administrative Code mandates public trials based on oral testimony and argument and gives the accused the right to be present. In most criminal cases, however, the court process allows written presentations by the prosecution and defense without the presence of the accused. Any documentary evidence is available for examination by both sides. Both prosecution and defense have the right to appeal the verdict. A new Administrative Code was promulgated in 1982, and a new Penal Code was enacted in 1983. A revision of the Judicial Code was completed in October 1984, with the stated goal of modernizing the legal system and making the courts more accessible to all classes of Panamanians.

Panamanian and foreign observers have noted that juvenile delinquents are occasionally tried and incarcerated as adults, especially when they are considered to be hardened criminals. Although the Constitution prohibits self-incrimination, there also have been charges that juveniles and poor people with criminal records have been detained and pressured during interrogation to confess to crimes they may not have committed. Other reported practices--publicly criticized in the Panamanian press by government officials as well as private citizens--include summary proceedings and convictions for misdemeanors by "night court" judges without duly prescribed defense counsel.

The Supreme Court is charged with upholding the Constitution and the laws, and magistrates and judges are legally independent. The 1983 constitutional amendments have in theory strengthened the financial independence of the judiciary by guaranteeing it two percent of government revenues; in fact, however, it received less than one percent (the two percent is shared with the Attorney General' office, and the full amount was not delivered in the past year). Judges are paid relatively low salaries, even following a substantial raise in the past year. Magistrates are barred from simultaneously holding other public office or otherwise participating in politics. It must be noted that the Executive continues to exercise some influence over the judicial branch.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Private family life generally is respected. One recent departure from the norm reportedly occurred when, in the course of dispersing an opposition demonstration on October 10, the PDF riot squad pursued fleeing oppositionists into nearby private residences and caused damages to these premises in the course of making arrests. Under the Constitution, judicial warrents must be issued before officials may enter houses. There were occasional reports in 1984 that police violated this guarantee by entering without warrents.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution guarantees freedom of speech, press, and other forms of communication without censorship. There is no interference with academic freedom. The views of government opponents are made known through their speeches, and through the press and radio. The opposition newspaper, La Prensa, the popular tabloid Ya, and various radio commentators publicly criticize government programs and policies. Opponents also freely and often vehemently criticize public activities of civilian and military officials, including the President and the Commander of the PDF. The 1984 electoral campaign afforded substantial freedom of speech, with opposition groups free to make speeches and distribute leaflets, pamphlets, and other election materials. Nevertheless, opposition groups experienced serious problems gaining access to the electronic media, with all Panamanian television stations and over 90 percent of radio stations controlled by pro-government individuals or groups. During the election campaign, pro-government electronic media largely refused air time to opposition advertising. Opposition groups charge that they are unable to acquire radio or television licenses from the Government, because once the identities of the owners become known, the license applications are refused. Opposition radio station Voz Del Baru was closed on a technicality in June after the elections; in October, the station was allowed to reopen. The new transmitter of the Colon opposition station, Radio Hit, was destroyed by arsonists in May; after a few days off the air, the station resumed broadcasting with its old, less powerful transmitter.

In the early morning hours of May 9, unknown assailants in moving vehicles sprayed machine gun fire at the offices of pro-government Editora Renovacion, S.A. (ERSA), which publishes three daily newspapers. ERSA accused opposition "commandos" of being responsible for the attack; the opposition claimed that the Government staged the shooting incident. In a possible act of reprisal, nine unknown gunmen in two cars fired shots over the residence of the opposition presidential candidate Arnulfo Arias late in the evening of May 9. No one was injured and none of the assailants in either case was ever apprehended.

Opposition newspaper La Prensa was the object of a short strike of its type-setters and graphic artists in September. The paper charged that the strike was politically motivated and supported by only a quarter of the employees involved (although the remaining employees respected their picket line). It ended after a few days. The newspaper continues actively to oppose government policies and to publish freely, and is since mid-1984 operating at a profit. La Prensa has frequently been the sole source of public information on incidents related to the 1984 elections, such as the Vassell Rock case mentioned above. Another example was its report on the alleged beating of two of its journalists, Lissette Carasco and Aurelio Jimenez, by PDF personnel while the former were covering a December 14 march sponsored by the Government in support of the PDF. The incident was later condemned by the legislature.

The other six newspapers are more circumspect, especially regarding the security forces and their leadership, and exercise a measure of self-censorship. The three newspapers of the ERSA group are responsive to directives from the Government and security forces. Absent such guidance, however, individual columnists write freely about a wide range of topics. There is no censorship of foreign newspapers, magazines, books, or cable television programming.

In 1983, the Supreme Court ruled unconstitutional a 1978 press law which allowed a government-dominated board the power to rule on the professional competence (and thus the right to practice) of journalists or those seeking to enter the profession. The court further ruled that most categories of employees working for newspapers and in the electronic media need not obtain licenses for work. Nevertheless, the Ministry of Government and Justice of the former regime was accused by opposition papers of denying broadcasting licenses to individual opposition commentators.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution guarantees the right to peaceful assembly. Twenty-four hours' advance notice but not government permission is required for open-air meetings. However, while no demonstrations were banned during 1984, and all political parties held rallies throughout the country during the election campaign, the opposition encountered serious difficulties in holding rallies in May and October. For the final opposition rally before the general elections in May, the pro-government coalition, UNADE, rented all available buses (generally privately owned) several days before the event, and the authorities reportedly threatened bus operators with revocation of their licenses if they did not cooperate. In October, opposition groups alleged similar intimidation of bus operators, so that their march to protest the inauguration of President Barletta would be poorly attended. The October 9 opposition rally, which turned into an all-night vigil in Cathedral Square near the Presidential Palace, was violently dispersed by the anti-riot squad in the early morning hours of October 10. Anti-riot troops used rubber truncheons, billy-clubs, and tear gas to break up the crowd, which was reportedly behaving peacefully, singing and dancing to taped music. The authorities claimed that the opposition had vandalized the automobiles of residents in the area, who had called the police for help. The opposition alleged, however, that the anti-riot squad itself deliberately perpetrated the vandalism while it was dispersing the crowd. Newspaper reports claimed dozens of injuries and some one hundred people arrested, most of whom were released the following morning without being charged, the others several days later.

Professional and social groups meet without interference. Panama has a strong and longstanding labor movement, a liberal Labor Code, and union rights are generally respected. There are both political and apolitical labor organizations in Panama. One of the strongest is a local of the American Federation of State, County, and Municipal Employees (affiliated with the labor movements of both countries), and a second is the regional branch of the National Maritime Union of America. Both are AFL-CIO unions. Union elections are generally free from government interference. Consultation with unions about government policies, particularly employment issues, is institutionalized through a permanent national commission that includes representatives of the major labor organizations. Both collective bargaining and strikes are constitutionally guaranteed rights of workers, although government regulations restrict or forbid this right for certain government employees. Moreover, the Labor Ministry implements these laws in such a way as to impede or discourage organization of private employees in the Colon Free Zone and the offshore banking industry, which is a source of concern for the democratic international trade union movement.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Constitution guarantees religious freedom to all, and there is no state religion. There are no restrictions on the free exercise of religious beliefs, including proselytizing, and a broad range of religious groups operate freely in Panama.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Constitution permits Panamanians to move freely within the country and to emigrate, and these rights are honored in practice. It also prohibits compulsory exile and extradition of Panamanian nationals to other countries. Some civilians involuntarily exiled during previous regimes have since returned and resumed full participation in Panamanian society. Exiles remaining abroad have been publicly urged by the Government to return. Panama accepts displaced persons of widely differing ideological persuasions from other countries. Several hundred Salvadorans originally sponsored by the Government of Panama are now supporting themselves in a resettlement village. Perhaps as many as several thousand Cubans are now in Panama, awaiting onward emigration. No cases of forcible repatriation of political exiles occurred in 1984.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

On May 6, 1984, Panama held its first direct Presidential and legislative elections since 1968. Fourteen legally-registered political parties fielded seven slates, each consisting of a Presidential and two Vice Presidential candidates, and also nominated a total of some 600 candidates for the new 67-seat Legislature. The election campaign, of some two months' duration, afforded all parties the opportunity to convey their political messages to citizens throughout the country by means of public rallies and media announcements, except for the limitation on electronic media access and intimidations outlined above. Voter turnout in general elections was estimated at 77 percent, and election day passed without incident.

Panama's cumbersome vote counting procedures, agreed upon by all political parties and encompassed in the national electoral law, resulted in lengthy delays in determining the winners of the elections. 3902 voting tables passed their results on to 40 regional vote counting centers, which after often lengthy delays forwarded their results to the National Vote Counting Board, which was to resolve all disputes and challenges and produce the final vote tally. In the event, the National Vote Counting Board merely read off the 40 vote counts, declared itself unable to determine the final vote count, and forwarded its totals to the three-man Electoral Tribunal, the ultimate electoral authority in Panama, to determine the official results. 372 voting tables in 18 of the 40 vote counting circuits were challenged by the government or opposition coalitions before the Electoral Tribunal, which summarily rejected all challenges but also did not count the disputed tables in the final vote count. The result was to eliminate some 60,000 votes from the final tally without ever judging whether those votes were valid or not. On May 16 the Electoral Tribunal announced it had determined that the government coalition candidate had won by 1713 votes (300,748 to 299,035). There followed a series of last-minute legal maneuverings by the opposition coalition to block a final ruling, amidst repeated charges of PDF coercion and physical alteration of tally sheets in the National Vote Counting Board and Electoral Tribunal. Nevertheless, the government slate received its credentials on May 30. The determination of which legislators had been elected on May 6 became bogged down in lengthy court battles, and not until September was a final ruling made on all contests. One race was declared a tie by the Electoral Tribunal, which ordered a new election held in October. Having taken the position that the opposition candidate had clearly won, the President of the Electoral Tribunal resigned in protest after being outvoted 2 to 1. This was the last of a number of cases in which the President was outvoted by his colleagues in a disputed election (members of the three-man Tribunal are named, one each, by the Executive, the Legislature, and the Supreme Court). Several weeks after his resignation, he further publicly charged that several seats were won by alteration and falsification of voting records. With the government coalition's victory in the October election, the PRD, the principal coalition partner, obtained an absolute majority of 34 in the 67-seat legislature. Both opposition and non-PRD government legislative candidates publicly protested the outcomes of other legislative contests, claiming that they had won but been displaced by PRD candidates. In a public speech at the National Press Club in Washington in July, the President-elect characterized Panama's electoral system as "a mess" that badly needed to be changed to deal with the problems that followed the May elections.

The June 3 local and municipal elections for mayors and community representatives had to be postponed one week to June 10 because ballots had not been printed. The PRD posted a strong victory in these contests, with voter participation, however, dropping dramatically from May. The 505 community representatives, who met one month a year as a National Deliberative Body under the 1972 Constitution, will henceforth have purely local responsibilities. The National Legislative Council, a partially elected body which had legislative power prior to the 1983 amendments to the Constitution, went out of existence in November when the new legislature was seated.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government has espoused human rights causes in the Organization of American States, the United Nations, and elsewhere. A human rights committee formed in Panama in 1978 continued to operate freely in 1984. Amnesty International did not cover Panama in its 1984 report. Freedom House in 1983 rated Panama "partly free."

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Panama's total population in 1984 was estimated at 2,001,000. Annual population growth rate declined to 1.8 percent in 1984 (from 2.5 percent in 1980), while infant mortality was 20.1 per 1,000 live births, reflecting improvement in public health.

In 1981, 82.8 percent of the population had access to safe water (urban: 94.7 percent, rural: 69.8 percent). The ratio of calorie supply available for consumption relative to nutritional requirements has been estimated at 101 percent since 1977. Access to education is good. The adjusted primary school enrollment ratio was 112.22 percent in 1981. The overall adult literacy rate was estimated at 87.1 percent in 1980; the rate in rural areas was 61.8 percent, while the urban rate was 93.7 percent.

Under the Constitution, citizens are guaranteed the right to own property, as well as to avail themselves of economic benefits, programs, and services of the state, without regard to sex, social origin, birth, race, religion, or political opinion. Panamanian constitutions, however, traditionally have limited the rights of naturalized Panamanians and aliens to participate in retail commerce.

Recent economic performance has been weak, largely as a result of depressed regional and worldwide conditions. Real per capita gross domestic product was estimated at $2,116 in 1982, but has declined since then. Approximately 22 percent of the country's population live in extreme poverty -- unable to provide for basic necessities. A larger percentage of the poor is found in rural areas, but the trend toward urbanization has increased the number of poor in cities as well. President Barletta stated publicly in 1984 that one in six Panamanians was unemployed or underemployed. Unemployment is unofficially estimated at approximately 20 percent, rising to as high as 45-50 percent in pockets of urban poverty such as Colon.

Panama's social system and legal code accord equal treatment to women and to men. The Constitution prohibits discrimination on the basis of race, birth, social class, sex, religion, or political ideas. It also gives pregnant employees 12 weeks maternity leave and the right to return to their jobs. Women are accorded equal political rights under Panamanian law. They play an active role in political and governmental affairs, holding a number of important positions. The 67 members of the new legislature include several women. Two independent agency heads and the presidential spokesperson in the new Barletta Government are women. Women also serve as the President of the ruling party, one of the three members of the Electoral Tribunal, three of Panama's nine provincial governors (including the Governor of Panama Province), and one of the nine Supreme Court Justices. Several women's organizations, such as UNIDAD and Accion Feminina, are active in Panamanian politics. Panamanian women enjoy full social freedom but in general still do not have the same opportunities for economic and professional advancement as do men. This reflects both traditional values and the current difficult economic climate. As Panamanian law does not recognize community property, divorced or deserted women can be and on occasion are left destitute.

PANAMA

Female employment in urban Panama is concentrated in the service sector, where wages are generally lower. Although the Constitution mandates equal pay for equal work, wages paid to women are frequently lower than those for the same work performed by males and increase at a slower rate. Government statistics showed that in 1978 women made up about 29 percent of the economically active work force.

Panama is a racially mixed country. The traditional monopoly of power by persons of European descent was effectively ended with the ouster of the civilian President by the National Guard in 1968. Blacks, orientals, and mestizos are now active politically and are well represented at senior levels of Government and the PDF, as well as in the new legislature, which also includes 5 Indians.

Prominent among minorities retaining a degree of separate identity are English-speaking blacks of Antillean descent, Jews, Arabs, Greeks, Chinese, East Indians, and North Americans. All these groups play roles in Panama's urban economy well out of proportion to their numbers. There is no discrimination in law against these or any other social, religious, or cultural groups, except that certain categories of elected office and ownership of retail trade establishments are constitutionally restricted to native-born Panamanians. While innumerable exceptions exist, Caucasians, orientals, and mestizos tend to be better off economically and to occupy higher positions in Government than blacks and American Indians; however, the latter groups participate actively in both the public and private sectors. Indian tribes receive special government assistance, particularly in the areas of public health and welfare, and education. They are not restricted to their tribal areas, but most remain there by choice, reflecting longstanding resistance to assimilation. Indians enjoy full voting rights and all other rights of citizenship. They play significant roles in the Governments of four provinces. In October, the new President, in keeping with a campaign promise, named a Kuna Indian Vice Minister of Health. This is the first time an Indian has held Cabinet rank in Panama.

Panama's Kuna Indians mostly reside in a self-governing, semiautonomous district, the Comarca of San Blas, established in 1953. The Embera (Choco) Indians, who live in Darien Province, eastern Panama, gained government approval for their own homeland in 1983 when a law was passed establishing their own autonomous district, or Comarca. The more numerous and geographically widespread Guaymi Indians of western Panama made some progress during 1984 towards the establishment of their own homeland, but serious differences between the Government and the Guaymi still exist over the size of the Comarca. The Guaymi claim that the latest government offer would leave almost two thirds of their tribe outside the proposed boundaries of the Comarca.

In September, Panama hosted the fourth World Assembly of Indian Peoples, which was attended by Indians from more than thirty countries and sponsored with the assistance of international organizations.

PARAGUAY

Paraguay has had authoritarian regimes throughout its history, which has been marked by wars, insurrections and coups. Since 1954, President Alfredo Stroessner has governed Paraguay ruling through the Colorado Party, the military and police forces, and the government bureaucracy, all of which he dominates. He was elected in 1983 to a seventh term in a controlled election process in which government figures show he received over 90 percent of the popular vote.

Elections are held every five years for the presidency and the national legislature. However, the opposition's ability to conduct an effective campaign is severely restricted by the Government, and in practice there is no effective challenge to President Stroessner's authority. Some opposition parties are not legally recognized and all, regardless of their status, are subject to varying degrees of harassment by government authorities. The Government controls the electoral apparatus and limits opposition access to the media. There have also been allegations of vote count irregularities.

The situation in Paraguay continues to be characterized by the subordination of the legislative and judicial branches of Government to the executive and by the domination of the nation's political life by the ruling Colorado Party. The legislative branch, in which President Stroessner's Colorado Party has a two-thirds majority, is almost completely responsive to his views on all important matters. The judiciary, while independent in theory, is usually not able to serve as an effective check on the power of the executive.

There continue to be violations of civil and political liberties, though the number of serious incidents has declined significantly since the mid-1970s. As has been the case almost without interruption since 1929, the state of siege provision of the Constitution remains in force. Under it, the President may order the detention of any individual without trial for an indefinite period. The police forces arrest and hold persons arbitrarily without due process of law. Sometimes they cite the state of siege power or Paraguay's "anti-subversive" statute, Law 209; or, as was the case in most of the detentions which occurred in 1984, they simply give no rationale. Constitutional guarantees, such as protection of the integrity of the individual, the need for judicial warrants, freedom of assembly and association, the right of habeas corpus, and the requirement for a prompt and impartial trial, can be ignored by government officials. There are serious restrictions on the ability of the press to report and to express opinions freely, as illustrated by the Government's closure in 1984 of Paraguay's leading newspaper, "ABC Color". Trade union activities are also restricted, and strikes are not permitted.

Paraguay's turbulent political history, combined with its geographic isolation, small population and traditionally agrarian economy, produced a relatively slow rate of socio-economic growth until a decade ago. President Stroessner's rule has brought much-needed political stability and economic development, but at considerable cost to political rights and individual liberties.

After a period of rapid economic growth in the late 1970s and early 1980s, Paraguay entered a steep recession from which it has now begun to recover. After two years of decline, economic growth reached 4 to 5 percent in 1984. The balance of payments remains in a deficit position and substantial payment delays on international obligations still pose problems.

The most serious infringement of human rights during 1984 occurred when the Government closed the independent newspaper "ABC Color" on March 22, a particularly serious blow to the nation's political life. The newspaper remains closed, and the Government shows no sign of permitting it to reopen.

In 1984 some 41 arbitrary detentions came to public notice in which individuals were held without being charged or tried, usually as a form of extralegal punishment or as a warning because of their political activities. This figure represents the continuation of a sharp decline since the mid-1970s when the number of such cases was in the hundreds. All of the individuals thus detained during 1984 were subsequently released, 29 within a day or so. The other 12 were held for periods of up to a month. A number of prominent political exiles took advantage in 1984 of the Government's offer of the previous year allowing them to return; however, the Government has engaged in various forms of harassment against many of those who did return. At the the end of 1984 there were six persons who could be considered political prisoners, or whose trials appeared to be compromised by irregularities. This represents a significant reduction from the previous year.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom From:

a. Political Killing

There were no reported cases in 1984 of killings for political motives by the Government, political parties or other entities.

b. Disappearance

There were no reports during 1984 of any persons having disappeared under circumstances which suggested politically motivated abduction or terrorism.

Local human rights groups list ten persons who died in an incident in 1980 involving the armed seizure of a bus in Caaguazu Province as having disappeared. The victims' families maintain that, since the bodies were never returned to them and certificates of death were never provided, the ten "disappeared."

Local human rights groups also continue to charge that the Paraguayan security forces were involved in the disappearances of some 24 individuals between 1970 and 1977. Some cases involved persons detained in Paraguay; others are said to have been detained by Argentine security forces and subsequently turned over to the Paraguayan authorities. It has not been possible to verify these claims.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There were reports of mistreatment or violence committed by the police against suspects or prisoners in 1984. A new allegation of systematic torture stemmed from a case in June 1983 in which a medical student was briefly detained following a student meeting and subsequently expelled to Argentina. In a letter to an Asuncion newspaper in 1984, the student claimed that during his detention he had been interrogated, whipped, and subjected to a treatment known as the "pileta," in which the victim's head is held under water until suffocation begins.

Several widely publicized reports in 1984 described police violence against suspected criminals or prisoners. In one case, two police conscripts beat a suspect with billy clubs in order to subdue him; there are allegations that the victim was beaten further at the local police station. The following morning he was dead upon arrival at a hospital. The policemen accused of the beating were immediately arrested and legal proceedings instituted against them. In another case, several youths were reportedly beaten by a police officer who accused them of having stolen his car. The charges against the officer in question, who was the chief of security at the parliament building and who was said to have used his office there for his interrogation of the suspects, were subsequently dismissed.

These reports of police violence were atypical in that the press gave them heavy coverage. Nonetheless, physical mistreatment of suspects and prisoners by the police, either to obtain information or as a form of punishment, is believed widespread. The so-called "investigations police" are widely known for such actions. One of their prisoners, for example, told of being kept naked and without bedding for nearly a week. For at least one three-day period he and his cellmates were given no food. On another occasion the prisoners were forced to stand braced against the wall with their hands above their heads for hours at a time; on several occasions guards beat the palms of his hands and soles of his feet.

In most cases, once formally arraigned, detainees go to regular prison facilities, where conditions are generally better than in the police stations. Prisons are austere, especially the maximum security facilities administered directly by the Interior Ministry and the Asuncion police, which are used in more sensitive cases. For example, one man spent four years without trial in a room barely wide enough for a cot. Court and Justice Ministry officials visit the regular prison facilities several times each year to examine conditions and interview prisoners. They do not regularly visit the maximum security facilities, although representatives of the International Committee of the Red Cross are permitted access.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Detentions are used as a form of warning or punishment for those who criticize the Government or whose political beliefs or activities are deemed to be threatening. Sometimes individuals are picked up by the police, detained in local police stations, where they are often held incommunicado, and released after a few days, frequently without formal charges having been brought. Other detentions may be weeks in length.

Such detentions have sometimes been justified under the state of siege provision of the Constitution, which provides that persons may be detained without trial, and that public meetings and demonstrations may be banned in the event of war, foreign invasion, internal disturbance, or the serious threat of any of these conditions. Implementing legislation called for by the Constitution has never been passed. Despite constitutional requirements that the state of siege be imposed only for limited periods, in practice it has been in effect almost continuously since 1929. Technically, the state of siege was lifted outside the capital in 1978. In practice, backed by a court ruling that prisoners may be moved to Asuncion and held there, Paraguayan authorities act as if the state of siege were still in force throughout the country.

In the absence of implementing legislation, the Government and courts take the position that state of siege restrictions supersede the safeguards on human rights contained elsewhere in the Constitution and legal code. Several prominent legal scholars and the opposition political parties contest this interpretation.

In some cases of arbitrary detention the Government has invoked Law 209, the "anti-subversive" statute, a loosely worded law which provides for imprisonment of persons who "foment hatred," defame members of the Government, commit a variety of other acts, or are members of the Communist Party. In the cases of arbitrary detention which occurred in 1984, the Government did not cite either this law or the state of siege provision of the Constitution to justify its actions. In most cases, it gave no explanation at all.

The arrest in August of five labor organizers is illustrative. Picked up on August 18, 1984 in the town of Villa Hayes by members of the Paraguayan army, the five had planned to meet with construction workers at the government-controlled steel mill under contruction there. They were detained by the army until September 4, during most of which time they were held incommunicado; they were not informed of the reasons for their detention and their detention was not brought to the attention of a judge. All of these actions violate specific provisions of the Constitution.

During 1984, there were 41 known instances of arbitrary detention. All of these individuals were subsequently released. There are, in addition, at least two persons still being held from previous years who have never been formally charged or brought to trial.

Among noteworthy, positive steps in 1984, several individuals detained arbitrarily for extensive periods of time were either released or brought to trial. Escolastico Ovando, who had been held since 1977 after completing a 15-year sentence for alleged complicity in a murder case, was released on May 21, 1984. Cantalicio Orue, held without trial since 1974, was released on January 10, 1984. Rafael Mella Torre, a Chilean citizen accused of having participated in the murder of former Nicaraguan President Anastasio Somoza in 1980, was finally brought to trial in July 1984 after over four years' incarceration; his trial is now in progress. In late December the Supreme Court ruled on the cases of six individuals who have been held since 1980 for their part in the armed hijacking of a bus to publicize a land tenure problem. The Court rejected the Government Prosecutor's appeal to increase their sentence and all six regained their liberty in early January 1985.

Over the years many political opponents of the Government have either been forced, or have voluntarily gone, into exile. In December 1983, the Interior Minister stated that with the exception of two prominent opposition figures -- Domingo Laino and Luis Resck -- all exiles would be permitted to return to Paraguay. As a result, a number of political figures, many of whom had been in exile for many years, have returned to Paraguay since early 1984. Prominent among them were officials of the Colorado Popular Movement (MOPOCO), a dissident faction of the ruling Colorado Party whose leaders had been expelled from Paraguay in 1960. Many of those who returned have been subjected to various forms of harassment and temporary detention by the Government. There has been no change in the Government's position concerning the possible return of Drs. Laino and Resck.

In 1984 there was one reported case of a Paraguayan being sent into exile -- Alfonso Silva Quintana, who was released from imprisonment in March 1984 after serving a ten year sentence for violation of the "anti-subversive" statute, Law 209. Silva was expelled from Paraguay, and has since gone to join his wife, who was released from prison two years earlier and also expelled from the country.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

Paraguay, like most other Latin American countries, does not have trial by jury. Trials are conducted almost exclusively by presentation of written documents to a judge, who then renders a decision. All judgments are automatically reviewed by an appellate-level judge, and appeals to the Supreme Court are possible. Part of the trial process is open to the public and trials are routinely reported in the press.

Numerous safeguards set forth in the Constitution and the penal code in theory protect the rights of the individual during the trial process. However, the judiciary has traditionally been subject to extensive influence by the executive branch of the Government and by the military. This, together with the corruption in the judicial system, continues to compromise the ability of an accused person to receive a fair, speedy trial.

Over the past year, a number of changes have nonetheless been made which many observers credit with having improved the quality and speed of the judicial process. Widespread changes in the personnel of the judiciary system, particulary judges and their clerks, are said to have reduced the amount of corruption. One judge was suspended after having dropped charges against a Bolivian accused of having smuggled cocaine into the country. Several politically sensitive trials involving alleged violations of Law 209 which had dragged on for some time were concluded. However, it is widely acknowledged that the courts still are not independent of the influence of the executive branch in politically sensitive cases.

One example of the continuing problems within the judicial system is provided by the case of Gerardo Meza, who had been held without trial since 1980 under the state of siege provision of the Constitution. Some time in 1984, legal proceedings were apparently begun against Meza for complicity in a murder for which his two sons had already been convicted. However, according to local observers Meza has been held since 1980 in the maximum security facilities of the Interior Ministry, where he can be visited only by his family and by representatives of the Red Cross. As a result, he had no contact with legal counsel, and was apparently not aware that his trial was in progress until he learned, in August 1984, that he had been convicted and sentenced to nine years imprisonment.

As of December 31, there were an estimated six persons --already tried and sentenced or whose trials were underway-- who could be considered political prisoners, or whose trials appeared to be seriously compromised by irregularities. This represents a significant reduction from the previous year, primarily the result of two long-standing cases having been completed. There are an additional two individuals whose cases involved criminal offenses but which local human rights observers believe were affected in part by political factors. This too represents a considerable improvement over the previous year.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Government and security forces do not intervene as a matter of course in the daily life of the average citizen. The Constitution provides that, except to prevent the commission of a crime, private homes may not be entered without a judicial warrant. Nonetheless, some private citizens complain of their right to privacy being abused by the security authorities. Leaders of the Colorado Popular Movement, who were permitted to return from exile in early 1984 complain that they are followed by the police wherever they go, night and day. They also complain that their telephones are tapped, their private correspondence monitored, and their ability to move about restricted. The police have reportedly told them that they may not meet in groups of more than three, and it is claimed that those whom leaders of the group contact are later questioned. Other opposition figures and critics of the Government have similarly complained about interference with their mail, particularly foreign correspondence, and of having their telephones tapped. Although the Paraguayan police, in a statement in October 1984, denied the charges made against them by the members of the Colorado Popular Movement, and said that no such harassment by them had taken place, it is nonetheless widely believed that the charges made by this opposition organization are true. Finally, there continue to be cases in which foreign newspapers and magazines containing articles critical of the Paraguayan Government are confiscated at the port of entry.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The closure of Paraguay's largest newspaper,"ABC Color", in March 1984 was the most serious violation of freedom of the press in many years. Despite broad guarantees in the Consitution of freedom of speech and the press, in practice there are limits to the amount and kinds of criticism which the Government will tolerate. Such things as direct criticism of the President, the military, and key civilian leaders, are usually avoided by the major newspapers as are sensitive topics such as defense matters and corruption. It is widely believed that "ABC Color's" continual pressure against these limits was the reason for its closure.

PARAGUAY

Up until the time of its closing, "ABC Color" was by far the most independent and outspoken of the Paraguayan newspapers. During its 16-year life, the paper had become Paraguay's leading daily in terms of circulation and reporting. Its editorials often criticized government policies and it reported extensively on some of the more sensitive domestic topics, such as human rights violations, problems of corruption, and the inner workings of the Government and the ruling Colorado Party. On March 16, the newspaper's owner was detained by the police, ostensibly because of his refusal to identify the author of an article which contained critical remarks by an opposition figure. While the owner was in prison, the Government, on March 22, closed the newspaper for an "indefinite period."

The Government, in announcing its action, stated that "ABC Color" had systematically violated the Constitution, subverted public order, and threatened the peace and stability of the nation by printing seditious editorials and allowing itself to be used as a mouthpiece of "irregular political groups lacking legal status." The owner of the newspaper appealed the Government's action in a suit brought before the Paraguayan Supreme Court. That body upheld the Government's action, ruling that the Interior Minister, in whose name the closure of the newspaper was taken, acted within his powers and in the public interest. The determination of the Government to keep "ABC Color" closed was demonstrated on November 29 when the police, armed with a search warrant, entered the "ABC Color" warehouse and confiscated 1200 copies of a pamphlet recounting the Government's harassment of the paper and analyzing the Supreme Court decision.

The Government's action in the "ABC Color" case was widely criticized by persons of virtually all political persuasions, though public criticism was rare. One of the remaining major newspapers criticized the action in measured terms. Privately, virtually all objective observers agreed that the Government's accusations against the newspaper were unfounded and that the action violated the nation's constitutional guarantees.

Despite the closure of "ABC Color", a measure of press freedom does still exist. Of particular note was the reappearance of the weekly newspaper of the Febrerista Revolutionary Party, one of the recognized opposition parties. This newspaper has published strong criticism of the Government and its policies, subjects that other newspapers shy away from. The Catholic Church publishes a newspaper, "Sendero," which reopened after the "ABC Color" closure and now appears twice a month. It too has printed articles criticizing government policies and actions and touching on subjects which the Government considers sensitive. It is generally believed that the Government permits these two newspapers considerable latitude because of their small circulation and less frequent appearance.

The remaining daily newspapers have been noticeably more subdued in their reporting of sensitive issues since the closure of "ABC Color". They have been joined by a new daily paper, founded by a businessman with close ties to the Government. This new journal, which has been extremely cautious and supportive of the Government in its editorial policy, is viewed as an attempt by the Government and its supporters to move into the vacuum left by "ABC Color", which, until its closure, was the most widely read and influential paper in the country.

Paraguay's two television stations are both privately owned. Their news programs are carefully self-censored and closely monitored by the Government. They virtually always carry commentary laudatory of the Government; reporting on the activities of opposition parties is virtually non-existent.

Two of Asuncion's radio stations, Radio Caritas, which is affiliated with the Catholic Church, and Radio Nanduti, which is privately owned, have been notable for their willingness to broadcast more sensitive items of local news. Radio Nanduti in particular has specialized in carrying interviews with politicians of all parties, including those which are not legally recognized, sometimes on sensitive issues. As a result, the station was shut down for 30 days in July 1983. Since then the station's owner, Humberto Rubin, has received occasional warnings from Paraguayan authorities. For example, Rubin has reportedly been warned about giving too much coverage to the closure of "ABC Color". On November 6, 1984 Government authorities informed Mr. Rubin that he would no longer be permitted to work as an announcer on his station, apparently on the grounds that he does not have a valid license. This too is widely viewed as another form of pressure against the station.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

Despite constitutional guarantees concerning the rights of peaceful assembly and association for legal ends, these rights are often violated in practice. Under the state of siege which is in effect in the capital, it is technically necessary to obtain permission for any assembly of more than a certain number of persons, for whatever purpose. Generally, however, activities of organizations which are non-political in nature are unhindered and this restriction is enforced only in the case of gatherings sponsored by opposition political parties or other organizations critical of the Government. For example, a proposal in March by a group of opposition parties to invite like-minded parties from other South American countries to participate in a public conference in Asuncion had to be dropped when government authorities made clear that they would not permit such a gathering.

On the other hand, there were occasions when the Government did permit public meetings in which even those political parties which are not legally recognized were allowed to participate. For example, in February a group of opposition parties was permitted to hold a rally in one of Asuncion's parks. The rally featured speeches by a variety of opposition figures, including many from parties and organizations not legally recognized.

Similarly, while the police normally do not permit public demonstrations, even peaceful ones, that criticize the Government or its policies, occasionally such events do take place. In January, for example, a small group of persons demonstrated in front of the Ministry of Interior calling for the capture and extradition of Dr. Josef Mengele, the Nazi war criminal who is believed by some to be hiding in Paraguay. (The Paraguayan Government denies this.) The group of demonstrators was led by Mrs. Beate Klarsfeld, an anti-Nazi activist who was visiting Paraguay.

PARAGUAY

The right to free association is particularly curtailed in the case of the Paraguayan labor force. Paraguayan workers are not permitted to organize freely, as demonstrated most recently by the August detention for 15 days without charge of five union officials seeking to organize construction workers at the state-owned steel mill now under construction. Strikes are not permitted by the Government, and efforts at collective bargaining by the few independent labor unions which are permitted to exist are sometimes frustrated, with the tacit backing of the Government.

Most of the labor unions in Paraguay are members of the Federation of Paraguayan Workers which claims to represent over 90 percent of organized labor. The Federation is carefully controlled by the Government and is not able to defend effectively the interests of the Paraguayan work force. The leadership of the Federation, and of most of its member unions, is not freely elected by the membership, but rather is chosen on the basis of acceptability to the Government. Union officials who differ with the Federation's policies are often harassed or fired by their employers with the tacit support of the Government.

There are a number of independent unions in Paraguay, some of them organized at the company level. Some have been strong enough to bargain with management, despite efforts by private firms - sometimes supported by the Government - to resist their efforts. Some of the independent unions have been granted legal recognition by the Government, but others have not, making it difficult or impossible for them to bargain effectively. The Government is less likely to recognize groups which it perceives to be more independent of its control. For example, the Union of Professional Journalists has never been granted legal recognition, despite its claims to have satisfied all the legal requirements. The president of this union is a well-known journalist who in the past has been highly critical of the Government and who has been held without charges by the police three times for extended periods, most recently in 1983.

The activities of the independent unions are carefully monitored by the security forces and the Ministry of Labor. Their leaders are often summoned by officials of the police or the Ministry of Labor for questioning about their activities and, on occasion, to be warned away from those activities of which the Government disapproves. Sometimes more direct threats are used. On one occasion, an independent union's leaders were called by the police and told that if they did not immediately terminate a demonstration which was being conducted within their union office, all of them would be arrested on the spot and their headquarters closed down. The demonstration was called off.

The Federation of Paraguayan Workers does not maintain ties with any of the public or private international labor organizations. It was expelled from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) several years ago. The ICFTU delegation which visited Paraguay in late 1983 was highly critical of the labor situation in the country, complaining that the Government was systematically violating the rights of the Paraguayan working class.

Some of the independent labor unions in Paraguay do maintain ties with international labor organizations, and the ICFTU, in criticizing the Paraguayan Government, has called for greater international support for the independent unions in Paraguay.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Constitution establishes Roman Catholicism as the official state religion, but it also guarantees freedom of conscience for other denominations. With very few exceptions, this freedom is respected. Adherence to a particular creed confers no advantages within Paraguayan society and conversion from one faith to another is permissible. Many denominations conduct their activities freely, and missionaries are, for the most part, permitted to enter the country and proselytize. However, Paraguayan law prohibits the granting of legal status to new religious groups and a few evangelical churches have been unable to obtain government approval for their operations. The Jehovah's Witnesses, for example, lost its legal registration in 1979. The church filed an appeal with the Paraguayan Supreme Court, but no action has ever been taken on it.

d. Freedom of Movement within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration and Repatriation

The Constitution provides for freedom of movement, which is usually not restricted within the country. Most citizens may enter and leave the country freely. However, members of one of the unrecognized political groups have complained that they have been told by the police that they must report any intention to leave the country 48 hours in advance. In addition, there continue to be complaints by opposition figures and human rights activists about difficulties in obtaining passports. Nontheless, there appeared to be fewer incidents of such restrictions on travel in 1984, and a number of prominent critics of the Government reported that they were able to obtain passports during the course of the year, although after considerable delays.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

President Stroessner dominates the Paraguayan political system. He rules through the Colorado Party, which administers public patronage, through the military and police forces, which maintain public order and guarantee the security of the regime, and through the governmental bureaucracy. The legislative branch, consisting of a Senate and a Chamber of Deputies, is almost completely responsive to the desires of the President on all important matters. The Colorado Party's two-thirds majority in both houses gives it complete control of the legislature. There have been very few occasions under President Stroessner's rule when the legislative branch has rejected Government proposals or policy. However, there have been some cases when Colorado party legislators have been able to delay, or even alter, legislative proposals submitted by the executive branch. The legislative branch also provides a forum for representatives of the legally-recognized opposition parties to express their views and criticize the Government. They have no real power, however, to affect the workings of the legislature.

General elections are held every five years for the presidency and the two houses of the legislature, most recently in 1983. The law requires that all Paraguayans 18 years of age or more vote. Two of the three legally recognized opposition parties participate in the electoral process; the third declines to do so on the grounds that the Government's control over the political process makes such participation meaningless. In 1983, the control of the electoral machinery by the dominant Colorado Party resulted in a seriously flawed election.

The domination of the nation's political life by the Colorado Party stems in considerable measure from its ability to dispense patronage and to take advantage of every opportunity offered by the machinery of government to maintain its predominance. Access to positions in the Government, as well as in the officer ranks of the military and the police, is in practice limited to members of the party. Individuals often join the party for economic and social advantages such as enrollment in the national university or permission to bid on public contracts. At the local level, police and government officials use their considerable powers and influence to support the Colorado Party.

In addition to the three legally recognized opposition parties there also exist political parties which do not enjoy juridical recognition from the Government, and therefore cannot participate in the political process. In any case, most such groups reject participation under the current electoral system. Since they are not legally recognized, these parties have more serious problems in attempting to proselytize and otherwise carry on normal political activities. For example, in June the unrecognized Authentic Radical Liberal Party sought permission to hold a convention in Asuncion for the election of new officers. Permission was not granted, and as a result the party was forced to hold a series of meetings in private residences as a substitute for a convention. The Christian Democratic Party has for many years sought legal status, insisting that it has already complied with the requirements of the electoral law. Nonetheless, this permission has not been granted. Regardless of their legal status, however, all opposition parties are subject to harassment by the authorities.

Section 4 Government Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

The Government describes negative comments about its human rights performance from outside sources as unwarranted interference in Paraguay's internal affairs. Nonetheless, the Government has normally responded to inquiries from organizations such as the United Nations Human Rights Commission and the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights. The UN Human Rights Commission continues to consider the human rights situation in Paraguay in confidential proceedings under resolution 1503. In addition, in 1984 the Commission adopted a resolution concerning the impact of the state of siege in Paraguay. The Paraguayan Government has generally cooperated with the Commission.

During 1984 a number of representatives of private human rights organizations, as well as private individuals concerned with human rights problems, visited Paraguay. For example, the Inter-American Press Society sent a delegation to Paraguay in June to inquire into the closure of the Newspaper "ABC Color" and to seek its re-opening. Members of the group met with a wide range of figures, within and outside the Government, and three of them met with President Stroessner. The same month, a group representing Americas Watch and the New York Bar Association, visited Paraguay to investigate the human rights situation. This group also met with a wide range of human rights activists and was allowed to visit two prisoners whom local human rights organizations believe are being held for essentially political reasons. The visit by the Americas Watch group took place only after a previous effort to visit Paraguay in April was aborted. At that time, the members of the group were detained briefly by the police following a dispute at the airport with authorities who insisted on examining and making copies of documents they were carrying. The group therefor decided to abandon the visit and left on the next available aircraft. Paraguayan officials subsequently invited representatives of the two organizations to return. The incident underlines the Paraguayan Government ambivalence towards such visits.

While for the most part willing to allow visits by human rights activists, the Government rejects any suggestion that serious human rights problems exist in Paraguay. The official newspaper of the ruling Colorado Party routinely dismisses the findings of organizations such as Amnesty International, which has for many years expressed concern over the situation in Paraguay. In its 1984 report, for example, Amnesty's major concerns related to cases of "arbitrary arrest, torture, the forcible expulsion of political detainees and the use of state of siege legislation to detain political opponents for prolonged periods without trial." The Paraguayan Government has never accepted the validity of such charges, and insists that such problems do not exist.

A number of local private organizations continued to be active during 1984 in trying to protect individual liberties. These include the Inter-Faith Committee, which is supported by three different church groups, the Paraguayan Human Rights Commission, the Paraguayan chapter of the Association of Latin American Lawyers for the Defense of Human Rights, and the Union of Paraguayan Women. The opposition political parties and certain of the media also have sought to publicize human rights problems and to express support for a more open and democratic society. These human rights groups make known cases involving alleged human rights violations and provide legal assistance to individuals. Their efforts have also helped to keep human rights abuses under international scrutiny and to secure the release of a number of detainees. As with foreign organizations which allege the existence of human rights problems, the Government is critical of local human rights organizations. Some local human rights activists complain of government harassment, which they attribute to their public criticism of human rights abuses.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Paraguay's population, estimated to be 3.6 million in 1984 and growing at a rate of 2.7 percent per year, is small in relation to its land area -- 157,047 square miles, about the size of California. Agriculture (including forestry and ranching) is the most important economic activity, accounting for nearly one-third of gross domestic product, one-half of employment and over 95 percent of exports. Probably because of the relative abundance of good land, urban poverty and landlessness are not as apparent in Paraguay as in many other developing countries. Aproximately 65 percent of the total population lives in rural areas.

In the mid-1970s, Paraguay commenced a period of unprecedented economic expansion stimulated by the opening up of the country's isolated interior for agricultural and ranching development and by the construction of hydroelectric dams, especially the massive Paraguayan-Brazilian Itaipu project, to harness the waters of the Parana River. Although statistics issued in 1978 show that 19 percent of the population falls below the absolute poverty level in urban areas, as does 50 percent in rural areas, the relative economic prosperity from the mid-1970s to early 1980s pushed Paraguay into the middle-income developing-country category with a per capita gross national product of $1,606 in 1982.

A steep economic recession during 1982-83 and currency devaluation since have reduced per capita income considerably, but in 1984 Paraguay was recovering from the recession with a growth rate of four to five percent, which should be similar in 1985. Open unemployment grew in 1984 as a result of the recession, especially in urban areas where it was estimated at 15 percent.

The Government professes support for a private enterprise economic system but public sector growth in recent years has outpaced the private sector and increasingly has infringed upon areas previously left to private initiative. In some cases, state monopolies already are economic burdens, and controversial public works or public sector industrial projects threaten to become additional ones. As the public sector has grown, reports of official abuse of public trust through graft and corruption have increased. Public sector employment and frequently contracts for government-related projects, usually depend on official connections or membership in the ruling party.

Even though nearly one quarter of the central government budget is devoted to health and education, funds available for social programs are low relative to needs. Life expectancy at birth was 66 years in 1984 and infant mortality was 44.7 per thousand live births, down from 109 in 1962. As early as 1977, the population as a whole was judged to have a daily caloric intake 22 percent greater than the minimum daily requirement. In the agrarian-based Paraguayan economy, adequacy of food is seldom a problem, although an imbalanced diet sometimes leads to problems of malnutrition among the poor. Government and private agencies attempt to address the latter problem through stronger home extension services.

Adult literacy is estimated at just over 80 percent (1972). Primary school enrollment was 560,621 in 1983. Statistics show that approximately 40 percent of the students enrolled completed six years of basic education. Some 60 percent of the primary graduates pass on to secondary education, but only 14 percent of the students entering secondary education eventually reach the sixth and final year. One of the recognized challenges facing the educational authorities is to increase school enrollments in the higher grades, especially in rural areas. Efforts are also being aimed at improving teaching standards and relating the content of education to the requirement of the country.

PARAGUAY

Paraguay has an unassimilated Indian population estimated at 45,000. The Government's National Indigenous Institute can purchase land on behalf of the Indians and expropriate private property to establish tribal homelands. Implementation of this program has been slow and thus far its promise has not been realized, but during 1984 the Institute did purchase land on behalf of a group of Indians for the first time. The problems of the Indian population continue to receive wide publicity in the Paraguayan media. The most prominent issue during 1984 was a dispute between some 300 families of the Maskoy tribe and a large company which, according to the tribe, expelled them from their traditional lands. A number of organizations, including the Institute and the Government's land reform agency, the National Indigenous Institute for Rural Welfare, are involved in efforts to resettle the Maskoy tribe.

The Constitution guarantees "the equality of civil and political rights" of women, while emphasizing the importance of marriage and the unity of the family. Women play a subordinate role in the political life of Paraguay. The executive and judicial branches of Government have a few prominent female officials, and there are three women in the 90-member Parliament. Several others, including a prominent human rights leader, enjoy independent political renown. While the traditional social system limits the participation of women, particularly those from lower income groups, an increasing number are participating effectively in business, the professions, and the artistic world. However, women usually receive less remuneration than men for comparable work. There are two organizations concerned with women's rights: the Paraguayan League of Women's Rights, a wing of the ruling Colorado Party, and the Union of Paraguayan Women, an organization founded in 1982 by a former opposition member of the Parliament.

Peru returned to democratic rule in July 1980, following free and open elections held in accordance with the 1979 Constitution written by an elected constituent assembly. The Constitution provides for a republic with an executive branch, a bicameral legislature, and an autonomous judicial system. It also provides for an independent Public Ministry, headed by an autonomous Attorney General whose functions were envisioned as incorporating both prosecutorial and ombudsman-like roles.

Peru's return to democracy came after more than a decade of military rule that began with a coup in 1968, and Peruvians have demonstrated their support for the electoral process and the right to choose among partisan alternatives. A large plurality of voters cast their ballots for Fernando Belaunde's Popular Action party in national and municipal elections in 1980. But in municipal elections held in November 1983, candidates of two major opposition groups scored major successes. Throughout 1984, the focus of the political process remained on candidate selection among the four main and the many smaller parties expecting to compete in national elections scheduled for April 1985. A lively and often times highly partisan press kept Peruvians informed of political developments and opinions in their country. Restoration of a free press was one of the Belaunde Government's major achievements.

In mid-1984, the President signed into law a major revision of the country's civil code. The product of nearly nineteen years of study, the revised code modernizes Peruvian laws, legal institutions and practices in an attempt to achieve greater compatibility with contemporary Peruvian society. The code represents a major step forward for women in Peru, whose constitutionally guaranteed equality with men is now recognized in specific laws.

Although Peru's restored democratic institutions continued to mature in 1984, the Goverment's efforts to revitalize a deteriorating economy and stem consequent social unrest met with only limited success. Persistently low world commodity prices and a very high debt service burden forced monetary authorities to follow a policy of strict austerity. Per capita GDP fell 14.4 percent in 1983; this negative trend was only partially mitigated in 1984.

Labor unrest, particularly among state employees, led the Government on June 8 to declare a national state of emergency which was extended following the recrudescence of Sendero Luminoso ("Shining Path") terrorist attacks in Lima and elsewhere in the country at mid-year. Security conditions improved sufficiently to permit restoration of suspended guarantees in most of Peru by October 6, but liberties were curtailed throughout the year (as had been the case in most of the period 1981-83 before that) in a broad, three-departmental "emergency zone" in the south-central Sierra. This zone remained under the political-military control of Peru's armed forces. The Government also placed under a state of emergency a smaller, mostly jungle region in north-central Peru, where a combination of narcotics traffic lawlessness and expansion of Sendero Luminoso terrorism had placed government authority in question.

PERU

The Sendero Luminoso terrorist phenomenon has had a seriously disruptive effect on the political life of the country. It has been responsible for a significant increase in the level of overall societal violence and for the random and particularly brutal killings in the emergency zone since early 1983. Sendero Luminoso's disruptive effect was compounded during late 1984 by the emergence of the Tupac Amaru Revolutionary Movement (MRTA), an unrelated Castroite, urban-oriented group whose leaders reportedly have been tied to Cuba and Nicaragua. MRTA particularly targeted U.S. installations and private facilities in 1984; its actions took place largely in Lima and achieved a high public profile for the group.

Although the nationwide state of emergency had little impact on daily life for most Peruvians, those living in the emergency zone were affected by the special regime there. Operating under a unified "political-military command," units of Peru's three national police services worked with soldiers and marines to reestablish government authority. Successes were spotty, and the Government expanded the zone in late 1983-early 1984. An upsurge of terrorist violence in mid-1984 appeared to provoke a corresponding campaign of security force counterviolence. By late 1984, government forces had succeeded in breaking Sendero Luminoso's dominance in Ayacucho, the zone's main city, and a number of rural areas. But elsewhere in the region terrorist cadres retained an ability to operate openly.

The emergency zone's isolation from Lima made information gathering about, or independent verification of responsibility for, events difficult. Nevertheless, the fact of a rising death toll and widespread brutality was indisputable. According to recently published statistics, 70 local government officials have been assassinated by Sendero Luminoso there since the beginning of the Belaunde administration -- 31 in the period January-October 1984 alone. The overall death toll in the zone resulting from Sendero Luminoso actions has not been tabulated but is believed to be heavy. In August 1983, Peruvian authorities reported total losses (since the onset of terrorist violence in May 1980) of approximately 1,600. As of late 1984, the government had not issued any updated statistics on the death toll, except to announce that some 1,355 terrorist incidents occurred in 1984. But compilations of individual reports of deaths in terrorist-related incidents indicated that the 1983 figure had perhaps tripled. Foreign and local human rights activists expressed concern that much of this loss of life was the consequence of indiscriminate killing by the security forces, a charge that both military and top civilian government leaders denied. Amnesty International reports issued in early 1984 referred to incidents in which persons reportedly detained by security forces subsequently "disappeared," eventually turning up dead and, in some cases, with their corpses displaying signs of torture.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

The phenomenon of widespread political killing in Peru is relatively new. Although Sendero Luminoso violence began in mid-1980, extensive brutal killing did not begin until early 1982. The terrorists' initial targets seemingly were selected: police, government authorities, and "exploitative" landlords and merchants. But in early 1983 Sendero changed tactics, fomenting indiscriminate communal massacres in which large numbers of persons--mostly rural villagers--died. In 1984, internecine clashes between pro- and anti-Sendero Luminoso communities became more frequent.

Security forces responded to escalated Sendero Luminoso violence with increased violence of their own. Although military authorities discontinued in 1984 the previous practice of issuing frequent communiques describing Sendero Luminoso losses suffered in "armed confrontations" in the emergency zone, thus making it difficult to track the toll of violence, indirect evidence suggested that the pace of killing increased. Newspaper and magazine accounts in the final weeks of 1983 reported the discovery of bodies, singly and in groups, in desolate spots near the emergency zone's two main centers, the cities of Ayacucho and Huanta. Most of these were the corpses of young men, among whom some were identified as individuals previously reported as "missing." A second series of such discoveries followed in the wake of a renewed Sendero Luminoso offensive that began in late June. Anti-government critics charged that these events disclosed a security force practice of killing suspects without trial or, for that matter, without regard to evidence of their involvement in subversive acts. Some pro-government spokesmen acknowledged the probability of cases of security force "excesses." Controversy was wide ranging regarding who was responsible for the deaths and what should be done.

In addition to deaths arising directly from the conflict between terrorist and counter-terrorist forces, government authorities acknowledged the involvement of a local police garrison in the massacre of over 30 villagers in Socos in mid-November 1983. Civil Guard head Juan Balaguer revealed on September 7, 1984 that 26 policemen (later indicted) were implicated in that event. Although he provided no details, news media alleged that the police in question had acted under the influence of alcohol -- with a minor dispute between villagers and policemen setting off a tragic massacre which the police later sought to cover up. Press reporting on other occasions also charged drunkenness among security forces as a causal factor in producing emergency zone tragedies. The zone's political-military head, General Adrian Huaman, attempted to restrict access to alcohol by personnel under his command.

b. Disappearance

The question of disappeared persons ("desaparecidos") became a major political issue in August-September 1983, with the publication of Amnesty International's reports. Amnesty International issued follow-up reports in early 1984 but, with a change of military leadership in the emergency zone and apparent corresponding change in security force tactics, the issue began to recede from the foreground. The private National Commission on Human Rights presented to the Public Ministry on May 9 a documented list of 661 cases of "desaparecidos." Almost without exception, however, this list dealt with complaints that had been registered in 1983 (i.e., before the January 1 change in zone command). Statistics released in late April by Ayacucho's District Attorney, Benjamin Madueno, offered a similar picture: of some 690 instances filed with his office, the largest portion (all but 100) dated from 1983. The anti-government Lima daily "La Republica" reported on June 26 that the total number of complaints presented to public ministry authorities from December 1982 until May 1984 numbered 1,200, a large majority having occurred in the single Department of Ayacucho.

However, beginning in late July and continuing through August and September, the controversy surrounding disappearances intensified dramatically. On July 27, campesino leader Jesus Oropeza was detained in a police station in the southern Ayacucho Department town of Puquio. Between that date and the discovery of his mutilated corpse on August 10, Oropeza was officially "missing," as police authorities asserted they had turned Oropeza over to an unidentified military unit on the night of the 27th. Interior Minister Luis Percovich on August 13 sent the Senate a police investigative report that changed fundamental details from the original police version but maintained that the police had not been responsible for Oropeza's death. But, after testifying before a closed Senate session August 16, Percovich acknowledged that the Puquio police appeared to have been responsible. The Senate itself issued a communique noting that grounds existed "to presume that the citizen Oropeza could have been victimized by (those) forces responsible for his custody and transport."

In a contemporaneous case in northern Ayacucho Department, "La Republica" Huanta correspondent Jaime Ayala Sulca went to the local security force headquarters on August 2 to protest a forced entry by police earlier that day at his mother's home. Although Peru's Attorney General himself investigated, Ayala was never seen thereafter.

On August 24, the press reported the discovery near Huanta of numerous corpses in several "clandestine" graves. Approximately fifty bodies were uncovered. Both President Belaunde and the Military High Command disclaimed security force responsibility for the deaths, asserting that the victims were likely Sendero militants who had fallen in combat and been buried by their comrades. Many press commentators in Lima disagreed, citing the fact that the victims' corpses had been disfigured and left nude to prevent identification; the manner of death too, they pointed out, was inconsistent with battle-inflicted wounds. Many normally pro-government publications editorialized on the dangers to Peruvian political society of allowing security force excesses to occur, but complaints of disappearances (such as that of Huancavelica labor union leader Hilario Ayuque on September 20) continued, and Lima's press reported the discovery of more clandestine graves near Huanta.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The Constitution prohibits capital punishment (except for treason in time of foreign war), torture and inhumane or humiliating treatment. Nevertheless, charges of security force brutality toward detained prisoners have been commonplace since the military entered the emergency zone in December 1982. Amnesty International's report "Torture in the Eighties" asserts that torture victims in Peru "have included people from all walks of life," although those of "the largely Indian peasantry, or from sections of the urban poor" are more likely to experience serious mistreatment. The Amnesty International report also charged that torture is more likely to occur before prisoners appear in court and (referring to the emergency zone) often precedes extra-judicial executions.

In general, prison conditions in Peru are primitive, and persons under detention are likely to encounter limited hygienic facilities, poor nutrition, and occasional ill-treatment by poorly paid prison staff. Charges of outright torture in such facilities, however, were notably absent in 1984. Torture charges that did appear in the press associated such activity with Sendero Luminoso terrorists and security forces engaged in combatting subversion. Chamber of Deputies President Elias Mendoza acknowledged on August 13 that some of those engaged in the anti-terrorist effort indeed had committed abuses. Although pro- and anti-government political leaders often disagreed as to the identity of those responsible for particular events, the mutilated bodies of victims found in the emergency zone frequently testified to their having been tortured prior to execution. A number of female detainees complained that they had been raped or otherwise sexually abused. In one such example, Juana Lidia Argumedo, a key witness in the trial of suspects accused of the January 1983 murder of eight Peruvian newsmen at Uchuraccay was, according to charges filed by the public prosecutor, raped by security force members after she was taken into custody in mid-September 1984.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution requires that persons arrested be arraigned within 24 hours for all crimes except drug trafficking, terrorism, or espionage, for which the limit is 15 days. Administrative difficulties sometimes preclude the 24-hour deadline from being met, but arraignment usually occurs in a timely manner. The Constitution also guarantees habeas corpus which is respected in practice. These guarantees are suspended, however, by the declaration of a state of emergency, under which police authorities are empowered to detain individuals indefinitely.

Aside from the particular experience of the south-central Sierra emergency zone, however, the 120 days that Peru spent under a national state of emergency in 1984 passed virtually unnoticed. Notwithstanding the suspension of constitutional guarantees, with only isolated exceptions police authorities did not detain persons longer than permitted by the Constitution. The exceptions in general appeared to be the product of local initiative, were of short-term duration and resulted in no known disappearances. Within the zone, little changed in regard to security force practices established in 1983. Allegations continued to be published in the Lima press concerning the detention of persons in the zone by members of the security forces, some of whom allegedly were not in uniform or were masked, and of the difficulty experienced by relatives in establishing the whereabouts of persons so detained. These complaints on occasion were echoed by Public Ministry officials posted in the zone. District Attorney Madueno, for example, protested publicly in April about a lack of cooperation by security force authorities who, he said, were impeding his office's operations. Of several hundred inquiries regarding complaints of "desaparecidos" that his office had sent to the zone's political-military command, only a handful elicited responses. On May 1, Madueno resigned in protest, an example that some other Public Ministry representatives in Ayacucho later followed.

The Constitution expressly forbids exile, and no such acts occurred in 1984.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Peruvian judiciary is independent of the executive in both law and practice. The National Council of the Magistracy, under the Attorney General, selects nominees for judicial vacancies; appointments are for life, and only Supreme Court justices require legislative confirmation. Charges of lower court malfeasance are investigated by the Supreme Court, while the National Council of the Magistracy investigates any complaints against the top tribunal and turns them over to the Attorney General if there are grounds for indictment. The Supreme Court itself has responsibility for final action.

All civil crimes are tried in civilian courts. Those arrested are entitled to have an attorney present when they make statements to the police. Public prosecutors (from the Public Ministry) customarily also are present, to assure that such statements have not been made under threat or coercion. A system of public defenders exists, but resources available to support it are limited and, in the final analysis, most defendants must themselves bear the costs of arranging for their own defense. In accordance with the Constitution, the burden of proof formally lies with the prosecution and arrested persons are presumed innocent. Nevertheless, Peru's jails are clogged with large numbers of untried prisoners whose cases have not been adjudicated due to administrative backlogs. A trial review system provides for a closed judicial hearing, followed by a public trial in Superior Court for those held for probable cause at lower levels. Where its jurisdiction so permits, the Supreme Court hears final appeals.

In common with other prisoners, persons arrested and formally charged with terrorist crimes face long periods of detention while their cases remain under investigation. Some 900 such persons were in various prisons throughout Peru in November 1983; by June 1984, that number had risen to approximately 1,100, and in December the Prime Minister declared that 1,966 subversives were detained. For security reasons, all trials of terrorism cases are concentrated in Lima, a factor which itself adds to delay, and the overwhelming majority of terrorism suspects have yet to see their cases processed to a final verdict through the several stages of the judicial process.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

A judicial warrant is required to enter a private dwelling, the inviolability of which is guaranteed by the Constitution except under a state of emergency. State authorities do not interfere with or regulate the right of individuals to join political or religious organizations. There is no indication that the Government monitors correspondence or telephone communications except as authorized by judicial warrant. Foreign publications circulate freely, and radio broadcasts from abroad are not jammed. The Government permits, encourages, and assists the promotion of indigenous languages.

Security forces in the emergency zone routinely availed themselves of their authority under the state of emergency decree to make warrantless searches of private homes. Elsewhere in the country, however, police exercised this liberalized authority in only isolated instances.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Peru's Constitution guarantees, and the Goverment in practice allows, freedom of speech and of the press. Acknowledged to be one of the Belaunde administration's key achievements, the reestablishment of a fully independent media was accomplished on its first day in office. Peruvian publications reflect political viewpoints across the spectrum, and the Government makes no attempt to censor criticism, including criticism of its human rights record. Under Peru's constitution and in practice, press freedom is not one of the civil liberties suspended when a state of emergency is declared, whether nationwide or in the emergency zone.

The Government came in for occasional press criticism in 1984 resulting from allegations concerning inappropriate police behavior toward individual journalists covering news events on Lima's streets. As in 1983, more serious allegations of security force interference with press freedom arose in the emergency zone. Two "El Diario" correspondents (Abilio Arroyo in Huanta and Luis Morales in Ayacucho) complained that the police continued to threaten and detain them arbitrarily. The latter newsman's 16-year old son "disappeared" briefly in April, but prompt intervention by District Attorney Madueno resulted in his release. The disappearance of Jaime Ayala led the Peruvian Press Association to issue a communique on August 14 demanding his immediate liberation and an end to infringements on press freedom in the zone. The Foreign Press Correspondents Association also issued a public protest (August 21), when security forces briefly detained three newsmen (two of them from UPI) when they arrived in Ayacucho to cover the Ayala disappearance. Conversely, many Peruvians were critical of what they considered the Government's excessive tolerance of deliberately false reporting by some media regarding the terrorist/anti-terrorist situation which, in their view, was destabilizing and damaging to Peru's image abroad.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

These rights are guaranteed in the Constitution and are normally respected by the Government, which is forthcoming in issuing permits for demonstrations. For the most part, the Government deals with even unauthorized demonstrations in a non-confrontational manner. The right to assembly is among those specifically suspended by the proclamation of a state of emergency, and on occasion the Government availed itself of this suspension during the 120-day period of national emergency.

The Constitution guarantees private sector workers the right to organize, bargain collectively, and strike. Public sector workers (except for armed forces, judges, and high officials) have similar rights, although with some restrictions. In practice, employees organize and strike freely. A legislative proposal to regulate the right to strike has been under consideration in Congress for over two years.

About ten percent of the work force is organized, and total membership in communist and other far left unions is somewhat larger than that of democratically-oriented unions. No significant part of the labor movement is tied to the Government or the government party. Unions generally are not formally linked with political parties, but important national confederations are identified with particular political tendencies. Union leaders are consulted regularly by the President, Prime Minister, and Minister of Labor, as well as congressional committees. Peruvian labor organizations affiliate freely with regional and international trade union organizations of all ideological tendencies. Peru is an active member of the International Labor Organization.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Roman Catholic faith is overwhelmingly predominant in Peru, and the Constitution formally recognizes the Church's importance. It also establishes the independence of church and state, which is respected in practice, and guarantees freedom of religion and conscience. Members of minority religions encounter no difficulty in practicing their faith or in exempting their children from religious instruction in public schools. Missionary organizations operate freely in the country with the cooperation of government ministries.

The few complaints that arose in 1984 with respect to freedom of religion had to do with the consequences of Peru's ongoing efforts to combat terrorism. Charges occasionally surfaced in sectors of the media, and were repeated by some government party members of Congress, of subversive activities being carried out in Peru by certain foreign nuns and clerics. The occasional detention of a nun or cleric by local police officials on suspicion of involvement with terrorists (such as that of Salesian Priest Rolando Ramos in Cuzco in early October) indicated that these expressions of concern, whether or not intended to be more than rhetorical by government spokesmen, could create an atmosphere of suspicion. In none of the cases did the initial detention lead to the pressing of charges, and all such individuals were set free, usually after only a short delay.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

The Constitution guarantees the right of free movement. There are no political or legal constraints on foreign travel or emigration. The declaration of a state of emergency suspends the guarantee of free movement within the country but, in practice, even during the period of national emergency in 1984 travelers were seldom hindered because of the suspension of this guarantee. Travel in the emergency zone continued to be affected more by the difficulty of moving about in mountainous and dangerous terrain than by prohibitions set by the security forces.

In June 1984, Peru acceded to the 1967 UN Protocol on the Status of Refugees. Even before accession, the Government had accepted the protocol in principle and did not force refugees to return to countries where they had reason to fear persecution; rather, Peru has assisted refugees to integrate into Peruvian life. Most of the Cuban refugees who came to Peru in 1980 have now been resettled. Historically, refugees fleeing turmoil in neighboring countries have been encouraged eventually to return but have not been pressured. Refugees from more distant places (such as Iran) have been either resettled or assisted in finding third countries that would accept them. The only cases in which Peru has approved involuntary repatriation have involved non-political criminals.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Peru is a democratic country governed by a freely elected President and Congress. The Constitution mandates universal suffrage for all Peruvians (except armed forces members) 18 years of age and older. The political process is completely open and vigorously contested by a broad variety of political groups, any of which citizens can join without government interference. Constitutional provisions guarantee participation in the political process to all, regardless of race or sex. Leadership of the various parties tends to remain largely in the hands of urban elites, whose access to educational, financial, and communications opportunities affords them de facto advantages over rural-based elements. Indians and Peru's small black community remain underrepresented at top levels of all governmental institutions and professional associations.

The Belaunde Government has enjoyed working majorities in both houses of Congress for almost all of its incumbency. (The Government's Senate majority depended on cooperation by a coalition partner, the Popular Christian Party, which opted to end their alliance in mid-1984.) Although members of Congress tended to accept party discipline, enough instances of broken ranks occurred to make votes at times unpredictable.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

Peruvian Government authorities continued to dispute charges in 1984 of alleged abuses made by both international and domestic human rights spokesmen and associations. Prime Minister Luis Percovich and Second Vice President Javier Alva, among others, described Amnesty International's 1984 report on Peru (which expressed serious concern about extrajudicial executions, disappearances, torture and prolonged detention of peasant leaders, as well as the use of torture and execution-style killings by guerrillas) as one replete with errors and inadequately investigated charges. The government-owned Lima daily "Cronica" editorialized in October that Amnesty appeared "to have no other source of information than communist newspapers" circulating in Peru (referring to considerable Amnesty International reliance on "El Diario Marka"). Pro-government press sectors periodically condemned foreign publications, especially in Western Europe, for printing allegedly distorted accounts of rights violations. Notwithstanding such criticism, however, government officials treated visiting foreign human rights advocates courteously and afforded them opportunities to travel about the country and interview both government spokesmen and critics. This was the case with a December 1983 visit by an "Americas Watch" delegation, which conferred with then-Prime Minister Fernando Schwalb and then-Interior Minister Percovich, among others. The Government also treated visiting Nobel Peace Laureate Adolfo Perez Esquivel with deference, facilitating his mid-May visit to Peru with a trip to Ayacucho and a private interview with President Belaunde. Domestic Peruvian human rights advocates denounced alleged violations and attacked the Government's lethargy in dealing with them; none appeared to suffer any retaliation or other adverse consequences as a result.

The Government's attitude toward the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) appeared to undergo change as 1984 advanced. While welcoming and publicizing an ICRC delegation visit to Ayacucho in January, government officials later in the year tended to ignore the organization and were unresponsive when the political/military command denied ICRC representatives access to detention facilities in the emergency zone.

Peru supports human rights causes in international forums, but maintains a low official profile. Most Peruvian declarations on international human rights issues take the form of editorial comment in the press and public comment by elected party and political figures. Peru is a member of the UN Human Rights Commission.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

Peru's population, growing 2.4 percent yearly, exceeded 19 million in 1984. GDP per capita was about $1,254 in 1982 and declined in real terms by about 10 percent in 1983. Median per capita income was estimated in mid-1982 at $640 in Lima and $600 in other major cities; in the rural areas it is lower. Many other indices illustrate Peru's relative poverty. In 1984, life expectancy at birth was slightly over 59.2 years, while the infant mortality rate was 98.9 per 1,000 births. Data from 1978 show that only 25 percent of the rural population had access to potable water sources, while 60 percent of urban dwellers did.

A 1977 study showed that Peruvians obtained 96.8 percent of their caloric needs. In 1980, the adjusted primary school enrollment ratio stood at 118. About 73 percent of the adult population was literate in 1972 (the last year for which data is available). This figure probably improved in the succeeding decade.

Composed of completely distinct geographic regions, Peru is a classic case of differential development. Public investment traditionally has been focused on the coast, drawing migrants to the cities, especially Lima. The one-third of the population in the capital area accounts for two-thirds of

PERU

Gross Domestic Product (GDP). Many Indians live in Peru's poorest regions in the mountains, and the difficulty and cost of providing services to areas remote from the mainstream of the dominant Hispanicized culture and the centers of economic activity impedes development efforts. As a result of this dichotomy and of historical prejudices, the economic and social needs of Peruvians of European ancestry are more likely to be met than those of Peruvians of mixed or pure Indian heritage.

The previous military Government made significant efforts to rectify this situation. The Belaunde administration attempted to continue these efforts and provide for sustainable and equitable economic development. The developmental achievements of President Belaunde's administration have been limited by a variety of factors. Adverse economic conditions that intensified in 1983-84 overwhelmed the Government and forced it to adopt austerity measures. Austerity programs, essential for economic recovery, create temporary hardship for the unemployed or underemployed (about 60 percent of the work force) as well as for the employed, whose wages have declined in real terms.

Tradition has impeded the access of both women and members of minority groups to leadership roles in major social and political institutions. This slowly is changing. A revised Civil Code, which took effect in November 1984, eliminated the inequality with respect to the ownership of property to which women had previously been subjected. Moreover, for the first time, a woman was chosen (December 1983) to head Lima's Superior Court. All major political parties indicated interest in selecting more women as candidates for congressional races in 1985. Proposals to open the officer ranks of the three national police services and armed forces to women, however, did not prosper in 1984.

ST. CHRISTOPHER AND NEVIS

St. Christopher and Nevis, commonly known as St. Kitts and Nevis, is the newest of the English-speaking Eastern Caribbean island states. The United Kingdom granted independence to the two islands on September 19, 1983. The Constitution establishes a parliamentary system of government with elections at least every five years. It also provides the smaller island of Nevis considerable self-government as well as the right to secede from the federation provided that certain procedures laid out in the Constitution, including a six-month notice, are followed. The new nation's popularly elected government is modeled after the British parliamentary system. There is an active and vocal political opposition.

The economic system is mixed. Most commercial enterprises are privately owned. However, the sugar industry, which is the country's largest, and 85 percent of all arable land are owned by state corporations.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

No political killings were reported in 1984.

b. Disappearance

No politically motivated abductions, extra-legal detentions or disappearances were reported in 1984.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

The authorities abide by the constitutional prohibitions against the use of torture or cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment. Security forces consist of a small police force augmented by a tactical reponse unit. Prisoners are housed in an outmoded jail; regular visits by family members, attorneys, and clergy are permitted.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

Constitutional guarantees prohibit arbitrary arrest and detention. Habeas corpus provisions require that any one detained be brought before a court within 48 hours. Opposition politicians have made unsubstantiated charges that the present Government has been involved in politically motivated arrests. There were no reported cases of exile.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution requires that every person accused of a crime receive a fair, speedy, and public trial. The judiciary is highly regarded and independent. Like most of the English-speaking Caribbean, St. Christopher and Nevis is served by the West Indies Court of Appeal. Legal assistance is available to indigent defendants.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

Neither the police nor Government arbitrarily interfere in the private lives of individuals. Warrants are required to search private homes.

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution guarantees freedom of speech and of the press. The country does not have a major daily newspaper. Each of the large political parties publishes a weekly or biweekly newspaper, and there are regional, church-funded newspapers. International news publications are readily available. Opposing viewpoints are freely debated on the television station which the Government owns and operates, and spokesmen for various organizations air their views on the commercial radio station.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The Constitution guarantees the right of peaceful assembly. Organized demonstrations, rallies, and public meetings sponsored by political parties occur regularly without government or police interference. Labor unions are free to organize and to negotiate for better wages and benefits for union members.

c. Freedom of Religion

The Constitution guarantees the free exercise of religious beliefs, and there are no restrictions on religious practices. The vast majority of church members belong to several Protestant denominations.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

Travel inside and outside of the federation is unrestricted. Citizens resident in other countries are free to return at any time.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

The multi-party political system encompasses a wide variety of political views. The minimum voting age is 18. Political parties are free to conduct their activities, and every party holds some type of annual convention.

The present Government is a coalition of two of the country's three major political parties: the People's Action Movement, led by Prime Minister Dr. Kennedy A. Simmonds, and the Nevis Reformation Party, headed by Simeon Daniel, the Premier of Nevis and Minister of Natural Resources and Environment. In the June 1984 national elections, this coalition won a strengthened mandate by taking nine of the eleven elected seats in the Federal Parliament.

Section 4 Government Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

ST. CHRISTOPHER AND NEVIS

Internationally recognized human rights organizations have not commented on the human rights situation, nor has anyone requested an investigation or called for inquiries into alleged violations. The Government is firmly committed to the promotion of human rights and is sensitive to any criticism related to this issue. Freedom House in 1983 rated St. Kitts and Nevis "free"; Amnesty International did not have a section on the country in its 1984 report.

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

The economy is emerging from a period of decline. Beginning in 1981, with the worldwide recession coupled with falling sugar prices, the economy of the country stagnated and total revenues needed for capital development projects fell by 13 percent. The gross domestic product [GDP] was estimated at $45 million in 1983 or approximately $920 per capita.

The Government has developed a program of economic diversification to increase earnings in tourism, manufacturing, and agricultural production other than sugar. The sugar industry remains the single most important revenue producer in the economy. It accounted for 17 percent of the GDP in 1983.

The population, estimated at 44,000, has one of the lowest growth rates in the area, averaging 0.3 in 1984. The birth rate is 29 per thousand; while infant mortality rate remains high at 41.3 per thousand live births.

The role of women is not restricted by law and it was boosted in the June 1984 election in which Constance Mitcham won a seat in Parliament, defeating the leader of the opposition. Ms. Mitcham was then named Minister of Women's Affairs.

ST. LUCIA

St. Lucia, a member of the British Commonwealth, has a multi-party parliamentary democracy which is the legacy of pre-1979 rule by the United Kingdom. The Prime Minister, John Compton, was democratically elected in May 1982.

Although the country's first two years as an independent nation were marked by political disruption, throughout this period constitutional processes prevailed. Prime Minister Compton's steady emphasis on promoting economic development has increased political stability in the last two years and a half, but potential instability remains, due to the country's still fragile economy and the large number of unemployed youth.

The only security force in the country is the police. Its Special Service Unit is specifically trained for national defense. A coast guard is being developed. The force is small but is imbued with traditions of integrity, professionalism and respect for human rights.

St. Lucia continues to have an excellent human rights record.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There have been no reports in 1984 of killing for political motives.

b. Disappearance

There have been no reports of disappearances in 1984.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There have been no reports of torture or cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment in 1984.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The St. Lucian Government abides by the Constitution, which prohibits arbitrary arrest or imprisonment and provides that anyone arrested shall be brought before a court within 72 hours. There have been no reports of arbitrary arrests or other forms of detention or forced exile in 1984.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution provides for public trials before an independent and impartial court. Accused persons are presumed innocent until proven guilty. The Constitution also guarantees the provision of legal counsel. St. Lucia's appeals court is the regional West Indies Court of Appeal, which is known for its impartiality.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

The Constitutional prohibitions against arbitrary search and entry are observed by the authorities. There are no reports of arbitrary intrusion of the State into the private life of the individual.

ST. LUCIA

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution guarantees these freedoms, and they are respected in practice. St. Lucia has two party-supported newspapers which present various shades of opinion. There are privately owned radio and television stations as well as the Government-owned Radio St. Lucia. There is no censorship of the media.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

In St. Lucia's pluralistic society there are no restrictions on public meetings. Opposition groups organize freely. Workers have the right to form trade unions, to elect their officers, to conduct union activities free of government intervention, and to engage in collective bargaining. The right to strike exists in the private sector if Government-sponsored efforts to resolve disputes fail. Trade unions represent the majority of wage and salary earners and historically have played a prominent role in the economic and political life of the nation.

c. Freedom of Religion

There is no religious discrimination in St. Lucia. The majority of the population is Roman Catholic.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

These rights are guaranteed in the Constitution and are generally honored in practice. The Government restricted the travel of sixteen St. Lucian citizens who had planned to travel to Libya in 1983. The Government said that they were going to receive terrorist training and invoked national security as the basis for the revocation of their passports. In fact their freedom to travel anywhere outside the country has been withheld for the present. Debate on this issue continues in the opposition press.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

St. Lucia has a freely elected parliamentary system of government in which citizens have a genuine choice of parties, policies, and officials. Its political system continues to be vigorous. Opposition parties play an active role in and out of Parliament, where they have 3 of 17 seats. Parliamentary elections were last held in 1982 and by law must be held again before May 1987.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

There have been no reports on St. Lucia by international human rights bodies or any requests for investigations into human rights violations. The major domestic organization that follows human rights developments is the multi-denominational St. Lucia Christian Council. Freedom House in 1984 rated St. Lucia "free." The 1984 report of Amnesty International did not cover St. Lucia.

ST. LUCIA

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

St. Lucia, an island of 238 square miles, has a population of 120,000, half of which is under 25 years of age. The 1984 population growth rate was 1.1 percent. There is a high emigration rate.

The country relies heavily on banana exports and subsistence agriculture. Bananas account for about 60 percent of the country's export earnings.

St. Lucia's estimated per capita Gross Domestic Product [GDP] is $926 per year. Over the past six years, St. Lucia has channeled more than 20 percent of its total recurrent expenditures into education, in an effort to expand secondary schooling. School attendance is compulsory between the ages of 5 and 15. Elementary school enrollment includes 95 percent of those eligible; however, shortages of facilities and classroom space severely limit secondary school enrollment.

The national insurance scheme provides for an increase in medical care; in-patient care at the general hospital is free of charge. Ninety-seven percent of the population has access to health care centers within three miles of their residence.

The infant mortality rate is 21.4 per thousand live births. Life expectancy at birth is approximately 72 years. One-hundred percent of the population has access to safe water. The literacy rate is estimated to be over 75 percent.

There are no restrictions on the role of women on St. Lucia. Women are well-represented in government and the professions, although the more traditional household role is the predominant one for females. The importance of women in other sectors of society is expected to increase as women take advantage of public schooling and other government programs which are administered non-discriminatorily.

ST. VINCENT AND THE GRENADINES

St. Vincent and the Grenadines retains the multi-party parliamentary system of government which it inherited when it became independent from the United Kingdom in 1979. Democratic traditions and respect for the rights of the individual have continued since then. On July 25, 1984, the ruling St. Vincent Labor Party of Prime Minister Milton Cato was defeated by the New Democratic Party led by James F. Mitchell, who assumed office.

St. Vincent is a poor country with a very young population, half of which is under 15 years of age. Unemployment, especially among the young, is a serious problem. The economy of St. Vincent remained sluggish in 1984 mainly because of a slow recovery from the world-wide recession and exchange rate reductions which affected the vital banana industry.

Although the Royal St. Vincent Police are the only security force in the country, a special service unit has been established within the police. In addition, a marine wing has been created under police command, although some members of the wing are not from the police force. The force maintains British traditions of professionalism which place a high value on respect for human rights.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for the Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

There were no reports of political killing in 1984

b. Disappearance

There were no reports of disappearances in 1984.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

There were no reports of torture or cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment or punishment in 1984.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention, or Exile

The Constitution provides for legal representation of the detained and for periodic review of their cases. The Government assiduously follows these provisions. There were no reports of arbitrary arrests, other forms of detention, or summary exile in 1984.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The Constitution provides for public trials before an independent and impartial court, a presumption of innocence, and right to legal counsel. Appeals can be made ultimately to the British Privy Council.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home, or Correspondence

There have been no reports of the arbitrary intrusion of the state into the private life of the individual. The Constitution prohibits arbitrary entry and search, and this prohibition is honored by the authorities.

ST. VINCENT AND THE GRENADINES

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

The Constitution guarantees freedom of speech and of the press, and the Government respects these rights. There is no censorship or interference in the operation of newspapers, which may openly and freely criticize the Government.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

The freedom to assemble peaceably is respected in practice. Public meetings and demonstrations opposing the Government took place during 1984. The Government has adhered to the International Labor Organization's Convention on Freedom of Association. Unions enjoy the right of collective bargaining. They represent approximately 7,000 workers, or slightly more than 10 percent of the labor force.

c. Freedom of Religion

All religions are free to practice and proselytize in St. Vincent and the Grenadines.

d. Freedom of Movement Within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration, and Repatriation

These rights are guaranteed in law and honored in practice.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change their Government

St. Vincent has a freely elected parliamentary system of government in which citizens have a genuine choice of parties. In the 1984 general elections the New Democratic Party enjoyed an overwhelming electoral victory by winning nine of the thirteen seats in Parliament and gaining control of the office of Prime Minister. Another general election must occur by 1989.

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

There are no branches of international human rights organizations in St. Vincent. There is no local body which publicly monitors human rights violations, although opposition political groups occasionally comment on human rights practices. The Government is responsive to public and private inquiries on its human rights practices. Amnesty International did not report on St. Vincent and the Grenadines in 1984; Freedom House listed the country as "free".

ECONOMIC, SOCIAL, AND CULTURAL SITUATION

St. Vincent and the Grenadines with a population of 101,000 inhabitants is a small, poor country with a moderately growing population (1.4 percent growth in 1984). Per capita GNP in 1982 was estimated at $616. The country relies heavily on its ailing agriculture sector; bananas are the principal export crop.

ST. VINCENT AND THE GRENADINES

The new Mitchell Government has identified an international airport, assistance to the outlying Grenadine islands, and tourist development as essential to economic progress. Growth of the economy also depends on the inflow of external public assistance.

The Government emphasizes education in its development policies. It has a ten-year compulsory education system. The adult literacy rate is about 95.6 percent.

The provision of health care is seriously hampered by a shortage of funds, facilities, and personnel. The improvement of physical facilities has occurred, but many trained personnel migrate each year because of low wages. St. Vincent has a rather high infant mortality rate of 51 per thousand live births. There is an ongoing family planning program.

The role of women in society is not restricted legally, although most women still center their lives around the home. Women are expected to take a greater part in other sectors of society in the future as they take greater advantage of public education programs, health facilities, and family planning.

SURINAME

Following independence from the Netherlands in 1975, Suriname functioned as a parliamentary democracy until February 25, 1980, when the elected government was overthrown by a military coup.

On August 13, 1980, Suriname's Parliament was dismissed and its Constitution suspended. Since the coup, absolute political power has been exercised or delegated by Leader of the Revolution and Commander of the Armed Forces, Lieutenant Colonel Desire D. Bouterse.

In December 1984, Prime Minister Wim Udenhout announced plans for new governmental structures which call for establishment of an interim National Assembly composed of representatives selected from various social and economic sectors. The National Assembly is to have legislative powers and is charged with drafting a constitution, defining the future role of political parties, and providing the mechanism for installation of a democratic government. The interim government is also to include an "executive" cabinet and is expected to complete its tasks within twenty seven months. The military will probably fill a large number of seats in this temporary cabinet and national assembly with members of the Government's February 25 Movement.

The highest judicial body in Suriname is the Court of Justice, members of which are appointed by the President (a largely ceremonial position) on the advice of the Government. The Court's effectiveness as a mechanism to protect human rights has been undermined by the military authority in the sense that individuals have been detained for questioning without warrants by the military police; they were held incommunicado; and, in some cases, they are subsequently released without being formally charged with having committed a crime.

In February 1984, the Government decreed a revision in Suriname's criminal code. Some of the more significant changes involved increased penalties for crimes against the State. The following examples from the revised code were reported in the press: "Attacks against the Highest Military Authority or Head of State are punishable by imprisonment for 10-20 years or life; threats or use of violence to break up government sponsored meetings can result in a prison sentence of 10-20 years; and the rendering of assistance to foreigners who engage in anti-state activities will be punishable by a 10-20 year jail sentence, with such assistance defined to include assisting in the import of items to be used against the State." Formerly such crimes stipulated a maximum penalty of five years imprisonment or a monetary fine.

Security forces consist of the armed forces, the civil police, the People's Militia, and the Youth Militia. Of the armed forces, the military police are most actively involved in investigating perceived internal security threats.

"Anti-intervention Committees" were formed in early 1983, in an attempt to organize the population against possible external intervention. More specifically these committees and other "revolutionary mass organizations" were to mobilize the people to "defend the revolution" against its internal as well as external "imperialist and neo-colonialist" enemies and to induce citizens to support social and economic goals as defined by Lt. Col. Bouterse.

SURINAME

In November 1983, the military Government announced formation of the February 25 Movement, which is to perform many of the functions of the other "revolutionary mass organizations." The regime intends for the Movement to become its popular political base, despite the fact that political parties are banned. In 1984, cells of the Movement were being established in government ministries.

Suriname continues to have a predominantly free market economy, but growing state control or influence has been exerted through regulation. Government control of increasingly scarce foreign exchange contributes significantly to the regime's leverage over the private business sector.

Surinamers still do not possess all of the human rights which they enjoyed before the imposition of military rule. Freedoms of assembly, of speech, and of the press have been curtailed. There are no political mechanisms to allow citizens a direct voice in how the Government is conducted or constituted. Laws have beem promulgated by decree. There has been periodic, arbitrary invasion of the home.

For the most part, Surinamers have been intimidated by the regime. The people have not forgotten the events of December 9, 1982, when 15 prominent opposition leaders (all but one of whom were civilians) were killed while in government custody. Activities by the military police, whose growing power was demonstrated by a continuous intrusion into areas formerly reserved to the civilian police during 1984, further intimidate the general population.

Nonetheless, certain rights are respected by the military Government. Trade union and business organizations, service clubs and fraternal orders carry out their normal functions. There is complete freedom of religion with no attempt to restrict religious practices. Racial, ethnic, and sexual discrimination against individuals is not condoned. Surinamers are free to travel within and outside of their country, although foreign currency regulations hamper travel outside of Suriname.

On balance, 1984 was a year of modestly progressive trends in the Government's respect for human rights. The military demonstrated growing responsiveness to international criticism of its human rights shortcomings. As a result of a relaxation of restrictions on the media in May, there was a somewhat freer and enlarged private radio and press. In August, the nightly curfew which had been in effect since December 1982 was lifted. That same month, the military authority announced its intention to establish a national human rights commission which could investigate allegations of abuse and designated Acting President Ramdat-Misier to head the commission. As a result, there was growing willingness of private citizens to appeal successfully to the Acting President for release of private citizens detained without judicial review. Finally, in December, the Government decreed creation of the National Institute of Human Rights to be formed in January 1985. The Institute was to be established in accordance with United Nations General Assembly Resolution 38/123 of December 16, 1983.

RESPECT FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

Section 1 Respect for Integrity of the Person, Including Freedom from:

a. Political Killing

The only known death with political overtones was that of a military policeman who had detained a well-connected businessman for attempting to take 104,000 dollars out of the country at the international airport at Zanderij. The businessman is said to have told the military policeman that he was acting for friends highly placed in the military, and to have given some names. The businessman was released almost immediately. The military policeman was transferred to another post where a few days later, he was beaten severely by other military police and left in the sun where he died.

b. Disappearance

There is no firm evidence that the Government has sponsored abductions or kidnappings by governmental or nongovernmental forces, aside from arrests by the military police as discussed in section d below.

c. Torture and Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

Beatings and cruel treatment occured in 1984 at the prison at Fort Zeelandia according to reports on which the Government has made no comment. One reliable report concerned a storeowner who was arrested at his home without a warrant by military police and was detained for four days at Fort Zeelandia. He was beaten about the body and suffered damage to an ear. While in detention he was denied sleep and water.

Another person, who was detained in solitary confinement for twenty-eight days, had to sleep on a stone floor, had only a bucket for personal hygiene, and was given little to eat or drink. Further unsubstantiated reports indicate that these conditions of incarceration at Fort Zeelandia are not unusual.

d. Arbitrary Arrest, Detention or Exile

During 1984 several persons were arrested arbitrarily by the military police and taken to Fort Zeelandia; in one of the cases mentioned under section c, the detained individual was questioned about things he had said, which had been reported to the military by an informer. When he protested that he had not violated any law, his interrogator reportedly replied that the military could arrest whom it wished.

Another person was detained for some weeks in solitary confinement in a small cell at Fort Zeelandia. For the first two days he was interrogated without stop. He was never accused, formally or informally, or told why he had been incarcerated, or, ultimately, released.

Two foreign citizens were arrested and held for six months in Fort Zeelandia. After pressure for an explanation or charge, the two were accused of having engaged in activities against the State. The charge was forwarded to the public prosecutor, who requested that authorities provide more detailed information. When none was forthcoming, the public prosecutor advised that they should be released, and they were.

Information involving the arbitrary arrest and detention of foreigners is more readily available since such cases become known through the international community, and those arrested are less reluctant to speak of their experiences, knowing they are leaving the country.

The most usually cited figure of persons detained at any one time by the military police is under ten. The civil police do not make politically-motivated arrests so far as is known. Those arrested by the military police were generally arrested surreptitiously, and always without warrants. They were rarely formally charged with any crime. The military authority usually did not admit that they were in detention, and they did not have access to an attorney or to a court or other tribunal. There are no legal protections for those arrested by the military police. The army alone decides whether, when and whom to release to civil authorities.

e. Denial of Fair Public Trial

The civil court system is able to provide fair public trials when the accused are turned over to civil authorities. However, it is much more common for people to be detained by the military police and then released without being formally charged.

In November 1983, eleven Surinamers were reportedly arrested by the military police in connection with arson and an alleged plot. Three of them were later interrogated on television by a military police officer and accused of having engaged in destabilizing activities and sending mercenaries into Suriname. Subsequently, some of the detainees were released and others were turned over to the civil authorities. Four were tried in June 1984. Three were found guilty of arson and sentenced to from one year to four and a half years imprisonment. A fourth person was found not guilty and released.

In August 1984, two military officers were sworn in as members of the civilian Court of Justice to assist strictly in cases of appeals from the military judge. To date, they have handled no cases at the Court of Justice, and it is not yet possible to determine what effect, if any, military officers will have on the Court.

f. Arbitrary Interference with Privacy, Family, Home or Correspondence

Military police have been known to enter homes without a warrant to conduct searches. The People's Militia, the "Anti-intervention Committies" and the February 25 Movement are organizations which have the potential to monitor what people say and to act as informers to the authorities. However, the People's Militia and the Youth Militia, once so visible on guard at various government buildings and other sites, virtually disappeared from sight by year's end. There are no known cases of persons having been forced to join or to actively support any of these organizations, though benefits do accrue to those who do.

SURINAME

Section 2 Respect for Civil Rights, Including:

a. Freedom of Speech and Press

Freedoms of speech and press, dramatically abridged after December 1982, have been somewhat less tightly controlled by the military during 1984. The climate of fear which resulted from the deaths of December 1982 continues, albeit reduced in intensity. The rumors of arrest and detention in Fort Zeelandia maintain a repressive atmosphere, which generally tends to inhibit free expression of opinions.

Suriname does not have a completely free press. In May 1984, suppression of the news media was eased somewhat. One newspaper was allowed to resume publication, in addition to the one which had not been closed. Two radio stations were allowed to broadcast, in addition to the state-run public station. Easing of censorship required acceptance by the news media of Government guidelines which generally restricted the nature and manner of treatment of media coverage. At times, the media were given specific instructions. In August, for example, they were told not to continue reporting details of the struggle for leftist control of the university. The Government owned and controlled television station also follows these guidelines, which cover internal and external political events, economic and financial questions, and, indeed, any field which may conceivably affect the "security" of the regime. During most of the year, media criticism of the Government was pointedly discouraged. However, toward the end of 1984, the Prime Minister encouraged "constructive" media criticism of his Government's policies. Several critical newspaper articles were published and there were no reprisals by the Government other than non-publicized expressions of displeasure to responsible parties.

In order to hear completely uncensored news about Suriname and the rest of the world, many Surinamers listen to shortwave broadcasts of the Radio Netherlands World Service, the BBC or the Voice of America. Because of the lack of foreign exchange, foreign newspapers and news magazines are not widely available within the country, though some sports, news and home magazines are still imported in limited quantities.

b. Freedom of Peaceful Assembly and Association

People may assemble freely for social purposes. Religious associations, clubs, and fraternal societies operate without restrictions. Political assemblies which do not support the military and the Government are not allowed and have not taken place. Pre-coup political parties are officially banned. Within the strictly labor-management sphere of trade union activity, labor organizations are usually free to operate without Government interference. Organizing, union elections, negotiations and strikes normally take place freely. However, the Government interjected itself in strikes at both multinational bauxite companies and several other firms in 1984. Serving as members of a tripatite "social partnership" with the military, union and business associations have participated in government in an advisory capacity to the military authority. Unions may affiliate with international bodies as they see fit. Several union federations maintain these affiliations.

c. Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is not infringed in any way. No one religion is favored above any other. Articles and programs sponsored by religious groups appear in the newspapers and on radio and television. In addition, weekly publications by religious groups are not censored despite the fact that they include articles concerning human rights issues. In late 1984 a church leader was cautioned against increasingly explicit criticism of the Government in church weeklies, but the Government took no punitive actions, and low-key church criticism of the Government did not stop.

d. Freedom of Movement within the Country, Foreign Travel, Emigration and Repatriation

Surinamers are not restricted from traveling within the country, changing jobs, or moving residences. In August 1984, the Government lifted the nightly curfew it had imposed in December 1982. Travel outside the country is restricted by the decree that residents may take only 625 guilders ($353) in currency with them per year. If Surinamers are bound for destinations other than Suriname Airways' terminal points, they must apply for foreign exchange with which to purchase onward tickets on arrival abroad. These restrictions result from a shortage of foreign exchange and not for political reasons.

Surinamers continue to emigrate without interference. The Government does not prevent persons from returning to Suriname after long residence abroad. However, those Surinamers abroad whom the Government has characterized as "mercenaries," "traitors," and "threats to national security" (these include former President Chin a Sen and others supporting the opposition leaders who were executed in December 1982) fear for their safety and might well be arrested and sentenced to prison terms if they were to return without advance Government assurances.

Section 3 Respect for Political Rights: The Right of Citizens to Change Their Government

Surinamers are currently denied the right to change their Government by democratic means. Power rests in the hands of the military, specifically Army Commander Lt. Col. Bouterse and his closest advisers. There have been no political elections since the military coup of February 1980. Political organization is limited to supporters of the military authority through officially sanctioned organizations, such as the February 25 Movement and the "Anti-intervention Committees."

Section 4 Governmental Attitude Regarding International and Non-governmental Investigation of Alleged Violations of Human Rights

In 1984, no independent domestic organizations focused on human rights. In their journals and from the pulpits, the churches indicated increasing but restrained concern over human rights violations. In August, Army Chief of Staff Ivan Graanoogst announced that the Government would establish a Human Rights Commission, to be chaired by the Acting President and former Chief Judge, Fred Ramdat-Misier. In December, the Government announced its intention to establish a National Institute of Human Rights in January 1985. Among other things, the Institute is to regulate and maintain respect for fundamental rights, to investigate complaints brought to its attention, to ensure that Suriname law is brought into compliance with international human rights obligations, and to provide information and support to commissions and groups of people who wish to be informed about fundamental rights and duties of man.

The Government has allowed international and non-governmental investigations of human rights in Suriname. However, to a lesser extent than in 1983, the Government attempted to control the activities of visiting investigative teams, to limit public knowledge of critical reports, and to exploit one-sidedly any investigation or report which contains positive comments.

A visit by Special Rapporteur Amos Wako of the U.N. Human Rights Commission took place in July 1984. Mr. Wako had come to investigate the December 1982 deaths. His visit was widely covered in the local media, and he was allowed access to those people with whom he wished to speak. The interviewees were circumspect in what they said. A business leader, for example, advised associates "to say only positive things about the country." The Government's attitude towards Mr. Wako cooled noticeably following his announcement that he would travel to the Netherlands to interview relatives of the people who died in December 1982. Mr. Wako's report has not yet been released.

A 1984 report by Amnesty International entitled, "Torture in the Eighties" noted in regard to Suriname that there had been frequent reports of torture or ill-treatment of persons detained by the military. The report stated that the alleged torture included severe beatings, threats, deprivation of sleep, food and drink, and even in some cases mutilation. In its regular annual Amnesty International Report 1984, that organization continued to call for an impartial inquiry into the extrajudicial executions of civilian and military opposition leaders which occured in December 1982, and concern was also expressed about the continuing incommunicado detentions of alleged opponents of the Government without charge or trial and ill-treatment of detainees.
